> The principle has long been settled in this court that each State owns the beds of all the tidewaters within its jurisdiction, unless they have been granted away. (Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 3 How., 212; Smith v. Maryland, 18 How., 74; Mumford v. Wardwell, 6 Wall., 436; Weber v. Harbor Commissioners, 18 id., 66.) In like manner the States own the tidewaters themselves, and the fish in them, so far as they are capable of ownership while running. For this purpose the State represents the people, and the ownership is that of the people in their united sovereignty. (Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet., 410.) The title thus held is subject to the paramount right of navigation, the regulation of which, in respect to foreign and interstate commerce, has been granted to the United States. There has been, however, no such grant of power over the fisheries. These remain under the exclusive control of the State, which has consequently the right, in its discretion, to appropriate its tidewaters and their beds to be used by its people as a common for taking and cultivating fish, so far as it may be done without obstructing navigation. Such an appropriation is in effect nothing more than a regulation of the use by the people of their common property. The right which the people of the State thus acquire comes not from their citizenship alone, but from their citizenship and property combined. It is, in fact, a property right, and not a mere privilege or immunity of citizenship. (McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S., pp. 394–395.)

> The planting of oysters in the soil covered by water owned in common by the people of the State is not different in principle from that of planting corn upon dry land held in the same way. Both are for the purposes of cultivation and profit, and if the State in the regulation of its public domain can grant to its own citizens the exclusive use of dry lands we see no reason why it may not do the same thing in respect to such as are covered by water. And as all concede that a State may grant to one of its citizens the exclusive use of a part of the common property, the conclusion would seem to follow that it might by appropriate legislation confine the use of the whole to its own people alone.
> Neither do we think this case is at all affected by the clause of the Constitution which confers power on Congress to regulate commerce. (Art. I, sec. 8.) There is here no question of transportation or exchange of commodities, but only of cultivation and production. Commerce has nothing to do with land while producing, but only with the product after it has become the subject of trade. (McCready v. Virginia, U. S. 94, p. 396.)

In Manchester v. Massachusetts (139 U. S., 240) the defendant, holding a license to fish under the laws of the United States, was convicted of a violation of the laws of Massachusetts. The Supreme Court of the United States held that there was no grant of power over the fisheries to the General Government; that the regulation of fisheries within the territorial limits of a State was not a regulation of commerce; that the power to regulate fisheries was left by the Constitution with the State.

In Mancheser v. Massachusetts (139 U. S., 258–9) it is said:

> In Dunham v. Lamphere (3 Gray, 268) it was held, Chief Justice Shaw delivering the opinion of the court, that in the distribution of powers between the General and State Governments the right to the fisheries and the power to regulate the fisheries on the coasts and in the tidewaters of the State was left by the Constitution of the United States with the States, subject only to such powers as Congress may justly exercise in the regulation of commerce, foreign and domestic. In the present case the court below was asked to reconsider that decision, mainly on the ground that the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the courts of the United States was not considered in the opinion and that the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on the power of Congress to regulate commerce required that the decision be reconsidered; but the court stated that no recent decisions of this court had been cited which related to the regulation of fisheries within the territorial tidewaters of a State, and that the decisions of this court which related to that subject did not appear to be in conflict with the decision in Dunham v. Lamphere, and that it never had been decided anywhere that the regulation of the fisheries within the territorial limits of a State was a regulation of commerce.
> It is further contended that by the Constitution of the United States the judicial power of the United States extends to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction and is exclusive; that this case is within such jurisdiction; and that, therefore, the courts of Massachusetts have no jurisdiction over it. In McCready v. Virginia (94 U. S., 391) the question involved was whether the State of Virginia could prohibit the citizens of other States from planting oysters in Ware River, a stream in Virginia where the tide ebbed and flowed, when her own citizens had that privilege. In that case it was said that the principle had long been settled in this court that each State owns the beds of all tidewaters within its jurisdiction unless they have been granted away; and that, in like manner, the States own the tidewaters themselves and the fish in them, so far as they are capable of ownership while running; and this court added in its opinion: "The title thus held is subject to the paramount right of navigation, the regulation of which, in respect to foreign and interstate commerce, has been granted to the United States. There has been, however, no such grant of power over the fisheries. These remain under the exclusive control of the State, which has consequently the right, in its discretion, to appropriate its tidewaters and their beds to be used by its people as a common for taking and cultivating fish, so far as may be done without obstructing navigation. Such an appropriation is in effect nothing more than a regulation of the use by the people of their common property. The right which the people of the State thus acquire comes not from their citizenship alone, but from their citizenship and property combined. It is, in fact, a property right and not a mere privilege or immunity of citizenship."

Concerning the case of Manchester against Massachusetts, which I have just referred to, I quote from Judson on Interstate Commerce, edition of 1916, page 24, where it is stated:

> In the case cited from Massachusetts the courts held valid an act of that State prohibiting fisheries in the waters of Buzzards Bay, except under regulations prescribed by the act, and held that it applied to a vessel which had a license to fish under the laws of the United States. There has been no grant to Congress of power over fisheries, and these remain under the exclusive control of the States. The extent of the territorial jurisdiction of the State of Massachusetts over the sea adjacent to its coast was held to be that of an independent nation, and except so far as the right of control over this territory had been granted to the United States, the control remained with the State, subject, of course, to the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States.

In the case of the Abby Dodge, Two hundred and twenty-third United States, page 167, the case of a libel against the steamer Abby Dodge for bringing sponges into Florida in violation of an act of Congress prohibiting the importation of sponges taken from the Gulf of Mexico or Straits of Florida, it was contended that the act was invalid in that it prohibited the landing of sponges even if taken in the waters of the State. The Supreme Court of the United States held that if the act could be construed to apply to sponges taken in the waters of a State, the act would be invalid as encroaching on the proper right of the State. The court held the statute applicable only to sponges taken outside of the local waters of the State, but held the libel defective for not negativing the fact that the sponges may have been taken from the waters of the State, a subject not within the constitutional authority of the United States.

Advocates of Federal revenues from water powers are no doubt surprised that the Supreme Court in this case did not take the position that under the authority to control navigation the act of Congress in question should apply legally to the navigable waters of Florida. A supple logic would have found that in the right to control navigation there was embraced the right to control the fisheries.

I quote from this decision:

Broadly, the act, it is insisted, is repugnant to the Constitution because in one aspect it deals with a matter exclusively within the authority of the States, and in another because, irrespective of the question of the State authority, the statute regulates a subject not within the national grasp and hence not embraced within the legislative power of Congress. The first proceeds upon the assumption that the act regulates the taking or gathering of sponges attached to the land under water within the territorial limits of the State of Florida, and it may be of other States bordering on the Gulf of Mexico, prohibits internal commerce in sponges so taken or gathered, and is therefore plainly an unauthorized exercise of power by Congress. The second is based on the theory that even if the act be construed as concerned only with sponges taken or gathered from land under water outside of the jurisdiction of any State, then its provisions are in excess of the power of Congress, because, under such hypothesis, the act can only apply to sponges taken from the bed of the ocean, which the National Government has no power to deal with.

We briefly consider the two propositions. If the premise upon which the first rests be correct—that is to say, the assumption that the act when rightly construed applies to sponges taken or gathered from land under water within the territorial limits of the State of Florida or other States—the repugnancy of the act to the Constitution would plainly be established by the decisions of this court. In McCready v. Virginia (94 U. S., 391), the question for decision was whether the State of Virginia had such exclusive authority over the planting and gathering of oysters upon the soil in tidewaters within the territorial limits of the State as not only to give the State the power to control that subject, but to confer the right to exclude the citizens of other States from participating. In upholding the statute exerting such powers the doctrine was declared (p. 394) to be as follows: "The principle has long been settled in this court that each State owns the beds of all tidewaters within its jurisdiction unless they have been granted away. (Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 3 How., 212; Smith v. Maryland, 18 How., 74; Munford v. Wardwell, 6 Wall. 486; Weber v. Harbor Commissioners, 18 id., 66.) In like manner the States own the tidewaters themselves, and the fish in them, so far as they are capable of ownership while running. For this purpose the State represents its people, and the ownership is that of the people in their united sovereignty. (Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet., 410.) * * * The right which the people of the State thus acquire comes not from their citizenship alone but from their citizenship and property combined. It is, in fact, a property right, and not a mere privilege or immunity of citizenship." True it is that the rights which were thus held to exist in the States were declared to be "subject to the paramount right of navigation, the regulation of which, in respect to foreign or interstate commerce, has been granted to the United States," but with that dominant right we are not here concerned.

Again, in Manchester v. Massachusetts (139 U. S., 240), in upholding a statute of the State of Massachusetts regulating the taking of menhaden in Buzzards Bay, the doctrine of the case just cited was expressly reiterated. True, further in the case, probably having in mind the declaration made in the opinion in the McCready case—that fish running within the tidewaters of the several States were subject to State ownership "so far as they are capable of ownership while so running"—the question was reserved as to whether or not Congress would have the right to control the menhaden fisheries. But here also for the reason that the question arising relates only to the sponges growing on the soil covered by water, we are not concerned with the subject of running fish and the extent of State and national power over the subject. (223 U. S., pp. 174–5.)

* * * * * * *

While it is true that it would be possible to interpret the statute as applying to sponges taken in local waters, it is equally certain that it is susceptible of being confined to sponges taken outside of such waters. In view of the clear distinction between State and National power on the subject, long settled at the time the act was passed and the rule of construction just stated, we are of opinion that its provisions must be construed as alone applicable to the subject within the authority of Congress to regulate and, therefore, be held not to embrace that which was not within such power. (223 U. S., p. 175.)

* * * * * * *

As by the interpretation which we have given the statute its operation is confined to the landing of sponges taken outside the territorial limits of a State, and the libel does not so charge—that is, its averments do not negative the fact that the sponges may have been taken from waters within the territorial limits of a State—it follows that the libel failed to charge an element essential to be alleged and proved in order to establish a violation of the statute. (United States v. Britton, 107 U. S., 655, 661–662, and cases cited.)

As we deem that it has no relevancy to the power of Congress to deal with a subject not within its constitutional authority—that is, the taking of sponges within the exclusive jurisdiction of a State. (223 U. S., p. 177.)

In Lee against State of New Jersey, Two hundred and seventh United States, 67, plaintiffs in error were convicted for dredging upon certain oyster beds contrary to the statute of New Jersey.

The court, by Justice Day, in rendering the decision, said:

It is the contention of the plaintiffs in error that this statute violates the right of free navigation and undertakes to regulate interstate commerce in violation of section 8, Article I, of the Federal Constitution, and deprives the plaintiff in error of the rights secured by the fourteenth amendment.

The power of the State to regulate the oyster industry, although the same is carried on under tidal waters in the State, is not contested and could not successfully be. (Smith v. Maryland, 18 How., 71; McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S., 391; Manchester v. Massachusetts, 139 U. S., 240.)

Why has not the State the same right to regulate its water powers?

Water power as well as fisheries are public rights under State control.

In Holyoke Water Power Co. v. Lyman (82 U. S., 153), in rendering the opinion Mr. Justice Clifford said:

Rivers, though not navigable even for boats and rafts, and even smaller streams of water, may and often are regarded as public rights, subject to legislative control, as the means for creating power for operating mills and machinery, or as the source for furnishing a valuable supply of fish, suitable for food and sustenance. Such water power is everywhere regarded as a public right, and fisheries of the kind, even in waters not navigable, are also so far public rights that the legislature of the State may ordain and establish regulation to prevent obstructions to the passage of the fish and to promote the usual and uninterrupted enjoyment of the right by the riparian owners. * * * Water rights of the kind, whether the streams are used for mill purposes or merely as fisheries, are justly entitled to public protection, as they are in many cases of great value to the community where they exist.

CONCLUSION TO BE DRAWN FROM FISHERY DECISIONS.

The conclusion to be drawn from these decisions is that the people of the separate States actually reserved, subject to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, substantial property rights in their waters, that can not be disparaged except by the paramount right to control navigation, and unless power development has some substantial relation to the improvement of navigation as a legitimate object, such development is a property right, the gains belonging to the people of the several States. Any other interpretation would make the reservation, referred to by the Supreme Court, of the beds and waters by the States a vain, empty, and worthless reservation, leaving to the States, perhaps, the scenery of our mountain streams and navigable rivers. Is it reasonable that the framers of the Constitution, jealous of the rights of the people of their respective sovereignties, contemplated such a bootless reservation when they declared in Article IX of the Constitution:

The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

That our navigable rivers are the highways of commerce, subject to the paramount control of Congress as to navigation, no one will deny. Congress may prevent the obstruction of the rivers in the interest of navigation. In many of our best rivers for fish it is necessary to place therein to catch the fish all kinds of obstructions, such as piling for fish traps and other kinds of stationary gear. In the Columbia River there are many miles of such piling driven into the bed of the river. The Secretary of War, under authority of Congress given him to control navigation, requires that such piling be so located as not to interfere with navigation. No one has ever suggested that this control of navigation gives the Government the right to exact rentals for the privilege of catching the fish, which, according to the decisions of the Supreme Court, are the property of the people of the State. Many million dollars' worth of fish are yearly caught in our navigable rivers, necessitating the placing therein of more obstructions than ever will be necessary for power development.

The seeker for Federal revenues has overlooked this ample source of revenue. Yet, if water-power resources are legally subject to a Federal rental, then our fisheries are subject to such revenue. If we are searching for revenues under the pretext of controlling navigation, do not overlook the wharves and docks encroaching on the waters of our navigable rivers, lakes, and harbors. Considering these wharves and docks, what a plenteous, copious, and affluent source of Federal revenue would not a trip on the Great Lakes disclose. Then down the Mississippi, on the Ohio and Missouri Rivers, a trip to the Gulf of Mexico, up the Atlantic coast line, then in New York Harbor. These are all waters subject to the commerce clause of the Constitution and to control by the Government in the interests of navigation.

If our water highways of commerce are subject to this Federal rental, why not exact a charge for any garage, hotel, or other structures or public convenience abutting any of our interstate highways, canals, or railroads?

All such highways of commerce are subject to the control given Congress in the commerce clause of the Constitution, for, as one writer states, the commerce clause was written in the days of the stagecoach. Judge Washington, in the case of Corfield against Coryell, which I have referred to, says "commerce includes all the means by which it can be carried on, whether by the free navigation of the waters of the several States or by a passage over land through the States, where such passage becomes necessary to the commercial intercourse between the States."

Judson, on Interstate Commerce, writing on the instrumentalities of commerce, quotes the language of the Supreme Court:

> They extend from the horse with its rider to the stagecoach, from the sailing vessel to the steamboat, from the coach and steamboat to the railroad, and from the railroad to the telegraph, as these new agencies are successively brought into use to meet the demands of increasing population and wealth. They were intended for the government of the business to which they relate at all times and under all circumstances.

Justice Brewer on the power of the General Government over natural and artificial highways:

> It may be suggested that the cases are not parallel, in that in the present there is a natural highway, while in that suggested it is wholly artificial. But the power of Congress is not determined by the character of the highway. * * * The power * * * springs from the grant of power to regulate commerce.
> We are so much accustomed to see artificial highways, such as common roads, turnpike roads, and railroads, constructed under the authority of the States and the improvement of natural highways carried on by the General Government that at first it might seem that there was some inherent difference in power of the National Government over them. But the grant of power is the same. There are not two clauses of the Constitution each separately applicable to a different kind of highway. The fee of the soil in neither case is in the General Government but in the State or private individuals. The differences between the two are in their origin—nature provides the one, man establishes the other. (Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States, 148 U. S., 342.)

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SINNOTT. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the gentleman's contention that Congress would have the power to control the navigable streams in other respects, but if it seeks to control them with respect to water power that any revenues derived therefrom should go to the State?

Mr. SINNOTT. It is my contention, over and above the administration expenses. My contention is that water powers on navigable streams belong alone to the State, subject to the dominant control of Congress concerning navigation.

Mr. WALSH. But, if the gentleman will permit there, if that be so, of course Congress would have the power so to frame the administrative regulations or statutes as to preclude there being any revenue for the States, would it not?

Mr. SINNOTT. Then the States would step in and exact the revenue themselves. Congress could not preclude the State from collecting rentals.

Mr. WALSH. Well, are they inhibited from doing that under this bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. Are the States inhibited?

Mr. WALSH. From stepping in if this bill becomes a law?

Mr. SINNOTT. They are not legislatively, but as a practical proposition they may be. If rentals are exacted too high above the necessary administration expenses it may make the water powers too expensive. It will increase the price to the consumer, and in that way it will make them, in a great many cases, practically prohibitory. That is what I am objecting to. The charge should be limited in the bill.

It is argued that the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of United States against Chandler-Dunbar Co. is authority for a Federal rental of water power. In that case the United States had secured by condemnation the riparian lands, had itself constructed the dam to improve navigation, and also created the power. Under these circumstances it was that the court declared:

> If the primary purpose is legitimate, we can see no sound objection to leasing any excess of power over the needs of the Government.

This case is certainly not authority for the general leasing by the Federal Government of our water-power resources.

In connection with the Chandler-Dunbar case, it is well to keep in mind the statement of Justice Marshall in Cohens against Virginia, Sixth Wheaton, and since reiterated in numerous decisions:

> It is a maxim, not to be disregarded, that general expressions, in every opinion, are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used.

It is further argued that inasmuch as Congress has the right to control commerce and for that purpose has the control of navigation in our navigable streams, its will is supreme, even though under the pretext and guise of controlling navigation it exacts rentals that amount to a practical confiscation of the reserved rights of the State in its water resources.

Were that the law it would be inequitable to enforce it.

> O, it is excellent
> To have a giant's strength, but it is tyrannous
> To use it like a giant.

But it is not the law; the power to regulate commerce did not divest the States of the control of their local affairs.

A similar contention of the supremacy of the control of commerce was made in the recent child-labor case, decided last June. The decision of the Supreme Court is an answer to the argument that the commerce clause of the Constitution has no limits.

In the child-labor-law case Mr. Justice Day, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> The grant of power to Congress over the subject of interstate commerce was to enable it to regulate such commerce, and not to give it authority to control the States in their exercise of the police power over local trade and manufacture. * * *
> The control by Congress over interstate commerce can not authorize the exercise of authority not intrusted to it by the Constitution. (Pipeline case, 234 U. S., 548, 560.) The maintenance of the authority of the States over matters purely local is as essential to the preservation of our institutions as is the conservation of the supremacy of the Federal power in all matters intrusted to the Nation by the Federal Constitution.
> In interpreting the Constitution it must never be forgotten that the Nation is made up of States to which are intrusted the powers of local government. And to them and to the people the powers not expressly delegated to the National Government are reserved. (Lane County v. Oregon, 7 Wall. 71, 76.) The power of the States to regulate their purely internal affairs by such laws as seem wise to the local authority is inherent and has never been surrendered to the General Government. (New York v. Miln, 11 Pet., 102, 139; Slaughterhouse cases, 16 Wall., 36, 63; Kidd v. Pearson, supra.) To sustain this statute would not be, in our judgment, a recognition of the lawful exertion of congressional authority over interstate commerce, but would sanction an invasion by the Federal power of the control of a matter purely local in its character and over which no authority has been delegated to Congress in conferring the power to regulate commerce among States.
> We have neither authority nor disposition to question the motives of Congress in enacting this legislation. The purposes intended must be attained consistently with constitutional limitations and not by an invasion of the power of the States. This court has no more important function than that which devolves upon it the obligation to preserve inviolate the constitutional limitations upon the exercise of authority, Federal and State, to the end that each may continue to discharge, harmoniously with the other, the duties intrusted to it by the Constitution.

NO NEED OF CONFLICT.

There need be no conflict between the right of the General Government with regard to navigation and the right of the State to its water resources; each can be exercised with due regard to the other; and it is our duty as legislators, representing State and Nation, to see that this equitable principle is enforced.

But rather than see these vast and valuable resources going to waste, I am willing to make concessions. I want development, whether that development is by State or Nation or half State and half Nation. I feel in the frame of mind Lincoln was in when he wrote to Greeley and said:

> What I do about slavery and the colored race, I do because I believe it helps to save the Union; and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the Union.

So what I do in this matter I do because I believe it helps to save this waste; it helps to bring about development of one of our greatest resources. What I forbear I forbear because I do not believe it would help to bring about development.

OREGON'S INTEREST.

No section of the country has a greater interest in legislation that will promote water-power development than the States in the Columbia River basin. Here is one-third of the potential 60,000,000 horsepower estimated to be in the United States. "Millions of horsepower in 'white coal' are here going to waste" is the language of the State engineer of Oregon, John H. Lewis, who has done much to awaken interest in the water powers of Oregon and the Columbia River drainage basin. His Bulletin No. 5 is a valuable collection of facts concerning the water powers of that region. It may be obtained by addressing him at the State capitol, Salem, Oreg.

DESCHUTES RIVER.

Water-Supply Paper 344 of the United States, prepared by the Geological Survey in cooperation with the State of Oregon, is another valuable compilation of facts concerning one of the most unique rivers in the United States.

From Benham Falls to the mouth of the Deschutes, at its junction with the Columbia River, a distance of 180 miles, the Deschutes River has a fall of 4,000 feet; at Benham Falls the minimum flow is approximately 1,500 second-feet; in 12 miles from Benham Falls it drops 600 feet. In the last 111 miles the Deschutes River, rushing in a gorge 1,000 feet deep, drops 1,400 feet and has a minimum flow of 5,000 second-feet; 5,000 second-feet would require a conduit about 70 feet wide and 70 feet deep flowing a foot a second. This drop of 1,400 feet is in a distance of 21 miles less than the distance from Washington to Philadelphia by the Pennsylvania Railroad.

The flow of this river is constant and dependable and in the last 111 miles is 2,000 second-feet more than the dependable flow of the Potomac River at Chain Bridge in the District of Columbia. In this distance of 111 miles on the Deschutes River 504,000 horsepower can be developed, almost equaling the present development at Niagara, which is 540,000 horsepower.

The development of this power on the last 111 miles of this river would permit the irrigation of from 300,000 to 500,000 acres in the upper stretches, with the aid of storage reservoirs, with little impairment of the power possibilities on the lower river, for the slope of the country and the substrata is such that the water will return by seepage to the lower river.

Water-Supply Bulletin No. 344 of the United States Geological Survey pronounces this river as the most remarkably uniform in flow of any other river in the United States comparable with its size " and its economic value almost incalculable."

Fancy a river almost double the dependable volume of the Potomac, with a fall of 1,400 feet between the cities of Washington and Philadelphia, capable of developing 504,000 horsepower, idle on account of our failure to enact legislation to encourage development.

State Engineer Lewis, to whose reports I am indebted for many of my figures, says that " something like 3,300,000 horsepower is now running to waste in Oregon. To produce this power, steam engines would consume 36,000,000 tons of coal annually, which, at $4 a ton, would be worth $144,000,000."

But with this difference, the coal would be consumed, but the water power or " white coal " is never consumed but will serve mankind forever.

From the Deschutes Valley may be seen lofty snow peaks of perpetual snow from 7,000 to 12,000 feet, rearing to the heavens their mantle of white to give assurance of perpetual waters, the gift of Providence. Are we wise enough to enact legislation to take advantage of such a bounty?

THE DALLES POWER.

At The Dalles, on the Columbia, is one of the most colossal power possibilities in the world. I have brought to the House to show the membership a picture of this site. This small picture, 6 inches by 8½ inches, was enlarged by Glenn M. Hauté, the photographer of the Reclamation Service, to 20 inches by 3½ feet. This narrow channel you see here is about 150 feet wide; directly above it the river is, at low water, as you see it now, 1,600 feet wide. Through this narrow channel the river flows with great velocity. The river, as you see it in this picture, flows about 50,000 cubic feet a second. For the benefit of those not familiar with the term cubic feet, used in water measurements, I should explain that a cubic foot a second is commonly called a second-foot; it is a body of water a foot wide, a foot deep, flowing at a velocity of 1 foot a second. A second-foot falling 8.80 feet creates 1 horsepower.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Oregon yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SINNOTT. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman advise the committee as to the industrial establishments that can utilize this tremendous undeveloped horsepower?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, it can be used by many industries; also in the fixation of nitrogen and various chemical processes. We have driven such industries to Canada.

The minimum flow of water for the past 20 years through this narrow channel has been over 50,000 second-feet; that is, a body of water approximately 225 feet wide and 225 feet deep continuously flowing at the rate of 1 foot a second. This Hall of the House of Representatives is 36 feet deep from the ceiling overhead to the pit in front of the Speaker's stand and it is 93 feet wide.

It would take a conduit approximately 1,300 feet wider, or fourteen times wider, than this Hall, and of the same depth from the ceiling to the floor, to carry the low-water flow, running a foot a second, at this point on this picture.

The drainage area of the water flowing through this narrow gorge is 237,000 square miles, five times the area of the State of New York. At high water the flow has reached 1,170,000 second-feet.

With a dam 25 feet high on top of these bluffs I am pointing to, a drop of 105 feet would be secured one and a half miles below, at the Big Eddy. This would develop 800,000 horsepower for 8 months of the year and 480,000 horsepower for the entire 12 months.

The report shows that 600,000 acres of arid lands could be irrigated by aid of this project.

The State of Oregon and the United States have made very extensive investigations of this power site, each spending $15,000 for that purpose. The results of that investigation are set forth elaborately in this large printed report which I hold in my hand. It contains 118 pages.

This report shows available for 12 months 480,000 horsepower; for 11 months, additional power, 120,000 horsepower; for 10 months, additional power, 100,000 horsepower; for 8 months, additional power, 100,000 horsepower. Primary and secondary total horsepower of 800,000 for 8 months.

The primary power here could be sold for $9.02 per horsepower if financed at 3 per cent, for $10.35 if financed at 4 per cent, and $15.15 if financed at 6 per cent.

If the surplus power over the primary 480,000 horsepower could be sold at rates equivalent to 80 per cent of the value of the primary power for 11 months' service, 60 per cent for 10 months', and 30 per cent for 8 months' service, the selling price of primary power would be reduced to $6.63 horsepower financed at 3 per cent, $7.85 at 4 per cent, and $11.02 at 6 per cent.

The first cost for water-power development at the great hydroelectric plant at Rjuken, Norway, according to H. J. Pierce, a well-known expert, is $9.37 per horsepower. He says the cheapest price in Europe is $12 per horsepower.

Forty miles below The Dalles on the Columbia River, at the Cascade Falls, is another power site where 200,000 continuous horsepower can be created. This latter project is highly recommended by State Engineer Lewis as the most logical for early construction. His Bulletin No. 5 contains tentative plans and estimates of more than a score of projects capable of developing 2,000,000 horsepower.

IN A FUTURE AGE.

I do not suppose any engineer would be rash enough to indulge in the speculation I am going to indulge in, but no one can safely forecast the future or what the demands of a future age may be when a greatly multiplied population will occupy the Columbia River basin.

I call your attention in this picture to the hills on the Washington shore; we call them hills in the West. Those hills are about 2,000 feet high; these bluffs I am pointing to are solid basaltic rock bluffs several hundred feet high. On the Oregon side of the river are similar hills to those you see on the Washington shore. Between those bluffs a dam could be constructed, at least 500 feet high, that would develop over 3,000,000 horsepower, almost one-half the Nation's present hydroelectric development.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How far is it from this possible water power to the point where the city of Portland secures its water power?

Mr. SINNOTT. It is less than 100 miles from there to Portland. You can supply Spokane, Seattle, Portland, and Takoma and all those sections from this one power—all Oregon, Washington, and parts of Idaho.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Except those cities will be supplied from other sources, too. The city of Portland has its supply from the White Salmon River.

Mr. SINNOTT. Some of it.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. How high would this dam be? The dam contemplated in the report was 25 feet. This would give a fall of 105 feet in 1½ miles.

Mr. SINNOTT. You can have a dam here of 400 feet. That would back the water up to Hermiston. Of course, that is not going to be contemplated for generations; but the possibility is there, and when they estimate our water-power resources a project like that is never figured on.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. With what project was this Government investigation made?

Mr. SINNOTT. It was made by the Reclamation Service and the State of Oregon.

Mr. WALSH. How many years ago?

Mr. SINNOTT. About four years ago.

Whether this larger dam, 400 or 500 feet, will ever be essayed, time only will tell; the possibility is there. Balboa's vision, slighted by his emperor, of a canal connecting the two oceans, took 400 years to become a reality. Others had the same vision, who—> * * * like stout Cortez, when with eagle eyes

> He stared at the Pacific, and all his men
> Looked at each other with a wild surmise,
> Silent upon a peak in Darien.

If some future age, " where rolls the Oregon," finds itself coalless, it may venture on this gigantic undertaking and develop the possible 3,000,000 horsepower latent in the stream at this point. Such a project with its dam would make a lake from one to several miles wide and some 80 miles in length, to some point below Hermiston, where the elevation is 458 feet. Such an immense storage lake perhaps would vitally and beneficially affect the climate and rainfall of the arid sections of eastern Oregon and Washington. Apart from the railroads on the two banks of the river, the lands that would be submerged, in comparison to the direct and indirect advantage of this colossal project, may in a future age be considered of relatively little value.

However, the economics of this great water power must be left to "the never ending flight of future days."

It is at least a possibility that affords interesting speculation.

Mr. SIMS. May I interrupt the gentleman there?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Is this location on public land or on State land?

Mr. SINNOTT. There is not any public land there. This is a navigable stream. There may be a little bit of public land, but I think there is practically none.

Mr. SIMS. Is it navigable above this narrow space?

Mr. SINNOTT. There are several miles of locks along here, and this dam would remove a number of those obstructions and dispense with a part of the canal.

COAL AND OIL SHORTAGE.

Mr. Chairman, the Fuel Administration estimates our coal consumption for 1918 at 710,000,000 tons. One annual hydroelectric horsepower would save 10 tons of this coal; our 60,000,000 estimated water power would, if only partially utilized, relieve the coal situation. The President, conscious of our coal shortage, has extended special consideration to the coal miners in the draft classification to encourage production. Our coal consumption for this year will exceed last by 14.4 per cent if this increase continues, or even the normal increase of 7 per cent per annum. A noted expert tells us, basing his figures upon the coal estimates of the United States Geological Survey, that the time is in sight when we must cut down our rate of increase of coal consumption. The oil consumption for 1916 was 312,000,000 barrels, production 296,000,000, a deficiency of 16,000,000 barrels. For 1917 it was estimated there would be an oil shortage of 70,000,000 barrels.

With our water power developed we need have no concern for our fuel supply, either of oil or coal.

This Aladdin's genii of exhaustless electric energy, dormant and locked up in our mountain streams and rivers, should be released to dispense light, heat, and energy for mankind.

Let us release the legal shackles from our water powers and put on the harness of industry. We are mobilizing our man power, let us mobilize our water power and reduce the drain on our oil and coal. Wise and considerate legislation will accomplish this object.

Make it easier for the manufacturers to obtain cheap power, and cities and villages will grow up along our streams. Make it easier for the irrigationist to obtain power, and millions of acres of arid lands now producing nothing but sagebrush and cactus will spring up in farms of grain, alfalfa, and other food products.

This bill, if enacted into law, will help accomplish these blessings.

It offers opportunity to municipality, State, Nation, or private capital to minister to our comforts.

I wish to discuss two important features of the bill: First, the definition of navigable waters; second, net investment and fair value.

DEFINITION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS UNSOUND.

I wish to call the attention of the House to a paragraph that I think should be eliminated; that is, the definition of navigable waters in section 3, which defines navigable waters:

"Navigable waters" means all streams or parts of streams and other bodies of waters or parts thereof over which Congress has jurisdiction under its authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

This definition of navigable waters is neither true in fact nor in law. The consequences of such a definition, if we could so define navigable waters, no one can forecast.

This definition, if valid, might change many titles and rules of property.

Only last March an important decision was rendered in the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Oklahoma in the case of the United States, as trustee for the Osage Indians, against an oil company. The case was decided by Judge Cotteral. It involved the ownership by the Osage Indians of valuable oil lands in the bed of the Arkansas River. The oil company leased the oil lands from the State. The State claimed ownership of the leased land on the ground that the river was a navigable river. The court held the river to be nonnavigable and decided the title in favor of the Indians.

Yet this Arkansas River, at the point in question, is under the jurisdiction of Congress, under its authority to regulate commerce, to preserve the navigability of the navigable parts of the river below the point in controversy. Under the definition of navigable waters in this bill the Indians would have lost their oil lands.

All the nonnavigable tributaries of navigable streams are under the jurisdiction of Congress, to preserve the navigability of the main stream. Congress in the act of March 3, 1899, assumed jurisdiction over such nonnavigable tributaries when it prohibited in section 13 of that act the depositing or throwing into the tributaries of any navigable river of any refuse matter which could float or be washed from the tributary to the navigable water. The act of March 3, 1899, also provides that before any bridge may be constructed across navigable water consent of Congress must be obtained, or else consent of the Secretary of War, at a penalty of from $500 to $2,500, with or without imprisonment. Now, if all these tributaries of navigable streams are to be classed as navigable waters, as they will be under this definition in section 3, before the local county officials can bridge their mountain streams they will be compelled to seek the consent of Congress or the Secretary of War.

If this definition of navigable waters in section 3 obtains no irrigation dam can be put in any of our mountain streams tributary to navigable waters until the approval of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers is obtained.

Surely all this embarrassment should not be put upon the local community desiring to bridge the tributary streams or to place therein irrigation dams. As a matter of law Congress has no right, in my opinion, to so define navigable waters if the ordinary incidents of navigable waters are to follow. The Supreme Court has repeatedly decided that waters are navigable in law which are navigable in fact. It is beyond the power of Congress to change this well-settled rule of law and property. Many rights of property have been built up under the definition laid down by the Supreme Court. It certainly would be very unwise for us to try to change the well-accepted definition of navigable waters.

On this question I quote from the United States against Cress, Two hundred and forty-third United States:

Many State courts, including the court of appeals of Kentucky, have held, also, that the legislature can not by simple declaration that a stream shall be a public highway, if in fact, it be not navigable in its natural state, appropriate to public use the private rights therein without compensation. * * * This court has followed the same line of distinction. That the test of navigability in fact should be applied to streams in their natural condition was in effect held in the Daniel Ball (10 Wall., 557), a case which turned upon the question whether Grand River, in the State of Michigan, was one of the "navigable waters of the United States" within the meaning of acts of Congress that regulated vessels carrying merchandise and passengers upon such waters. Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, after showing that the tidal test was not applicable in this country, said (p. 563): "A different test must, therefore, be applied to determine the navigability of our rivers, and that is found in their navigable capacity. Those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact. And they are navigable in fact, when they are used, or are susceptible of being used, in their ordinary condition, as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water."

NET INVESTMENT AND FAIR VALUE.

One of the most controverted features of the bill involves the question as to whether or not, on the recapture of the power project under section 14, there shall be paid therefor the net investment of the licensee in the property or the fair value of the property. The committee voted in favor of the net investment idea. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has filed a minority report favoring "fair value" as a measure of payment on recapture.

MINORITY REPORT.

In justice to the committee it must be said the minority report is hardly fair to the committee. It would not be too captious or critical to say that the minority report is actually disingenuous. At least, it is not frank. The minority report sets forth the recapure clause of the original bill as the one agreed upon by Secretaries Lane, Baker, and Houston.

This contains the fair-value plan which the author of the minority report [Mr. FERRIS] supports in opposition to the net-investment plan. He sets forth in the report "recapture proposal known as the 'net-investment amendment,' as provided by the majority members of the committee"; if the inference is sought to be conveyed that the net-investment plan orignated with the committee, in opposition to the plan of fair value first proposed by the three Secretaries, then the inference is not warranted by the facts. The proof of the matter is that the "net-investment" plan was communicated to the committee by the three Secretaries. They appeared before the committee in support thereof. Their letter communicating the net-investment amendment is on page 29 of the report. Secretaries Baker and Houston both appeared before the committee in support of this amendment, the net-investment plan.

As the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] intimated, I sometimes have misgivings as to whether the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], with his usual courtesy to members of the committee, is entirely responsible for that report. It is not frank——

Mr. FERRIS. I will relieve the gentleman's embarrassment about that by saying that I drew the report. Wherein does the gentleman——

Mr. SINNOTT. If the gentleman will let me go ahead I shall give attention to it.

On page 466 of the hearing is Secretary Lane's letter in support of "net investment."

On page 44 of the minority report the inference is left that land, good will, and intangible values are to be paid for under the net-investment plan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield me 15 minutes more?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized for 15 minutes longer.

Mr. SINNOTT. If this is not the inference designed to be left, I am at loss to understand why the following insinuating language is found on page 44 of the minority report:

> Thus it will be observed that on each occasion the House of Representatives provided that at the expiration of the term the developer should be paid the fair value for his property and no more. Thus it will be observed that on each occasion they provided that in no instance should lands, good will, etc., be paid for in the event of retaking. By consulting the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD it will be observed that each of the four times when water-power bills have passed the House of Representatives an attempt to tamper with or override this well-defined principle as to a correct recapture clause has been voted down overwhelmingly, emphatically, and to such an extent that it would seem that the matter should have been put at rest. By a consultation of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD it will be observed that when these bills were finally passed on each of the four occasions above mentioned they passed by practically unanimous vote and without any discussion or objection from any source.

This language is very misleading if it is to be understood therefrom that the elements of value heretofore excluded in former legislation are to be included in the net-investment plan. On the contrary, the net-investment plan specifically provides for the exclusion in the payment on recapture of all intangible values, the exclusion of the value of any lands, rights of way, or other property of the United States, the exclusion of good will, going value, or prospective revenue. Without the explicit exclusion in the bill the very definition of "net investment" contained in the "classification" of the Interstate Commerce Commission would exclude them. The exclusion in the bill is mere surplusage. None of these elements of value are taken into consideration in the recapture provision of section 14. I can not think that the author of the minority report intended the obvious inference in the language which I have quoted from page 44, for every property value, every intangible element, excluded under the "fair value" plan is likewise excluded under the net investment plan, except under the net investment plan a different treatment is accorded depreciation.

In view of this I am at loss to know why this language I have quoted was inserted on page 44. I am at loss to know why a constant reference is made in the minority report to the fact that the "net investment" idea was not in the administration bill, that it has been accomplished by an amendment added to the administration bill. Four times reference is made to the administration bill, leaving the inference or implication that the net investment idea is in conflict with the administration plan. The fair value recapture clause "agreed upon by Secretaries Lane, Baker, and Houston" is referred to. The "recapture proposal, known as the net investment amendment, as provided for by the majority members of the committee," is referred to. Why these repeated insinuations? Are they calculated to prejudice the House or are they mere inadvertencies? I know of no better way of getting the views of the Secretaries on the "net investment" plan than by listening to their testimony and reading their letters in favor of this plan. This I have done. I know of no better way—at least for a Republican—to learn whether or not a bill or an amendment is an administration measure than to find that it has the approval of three members of the President's official family and Cabinet—the Secretaries of War, of the Interior, and of Agriculture. I hope that no one in the House will be misled by the devious language in the minority report.

The minority report refers, with evident approval, to the principles heretofore adopted by the House to govern payment on recapture. I doubt if the author himself, in the light of the further study we have all given to this matter, would now approve, unqualifiedly, the very provisions he seemingly approves. For instance, the recapture clause of the Ferris water-power bill which passed the House August 24, 1914, set out on page 42 of the minority report, would allow, in payment on recapture, for the appreciation in value of structure and fixtures erected, machinery and transmission lines, and for appreciation in value of all other property taken over, save rights of way, water rights, lands, and interests therein; franchise, good will, or profits to be earned on pending contracts, or any other intangible element was not to be considered, but appreciation in value of all other property, with the exceptions mentioned, was to be paid for.

The recapture clause of the Ferris bill which passed the House on January 8, 1916, is set forth on page 42 of the minority report.

This clause would allow for the appreciation of lands other than public lands and rights of way, also for appreciation of structures and fixtures, machinery, and transmission lines, also for the value of "going concern," often an important element of value.

In the case of the city of Denver against Denver Water Co., decided by the Supreme Court of the United States last March, "going value" on the company's plant was allowed at $800,000.

The Adamson bills of August 4, 1914, and July 14, 1916, are set out on page 43 of the minority report. Both of these would allow payment for increases or appreciation in value of machinery, fixtures, transmission lines, and structures. In the latter bill appreciation could not carry the value beyond actual cost. All of these matters are excluded in the net investment plan; some of them, as I shall hereafter show, are still retained in the "fair-value" plan favored by the minority report. I say this not captiously, for these are all matters that require the most careful study and scrutiny and were generally inadvertently overlooked by the House when they were considered before. But these former bills should not, in the light of the information we now have, be held up as models of legislative integrity, and another and better plan, originating with and supported by Secretaries Lane, Baker, and Houston, stigmatized as "an attempt to tamper with or override this well-defined principle as to a correct recapture clause."

The attempt "to tamper with and override" has served a good purpose; it is to be commended, not censured.

"VALUE" UNSCIENTIFIC AND UNCERTAIN.

Secretary Baker, on page 673 of the hearings, stated that "net investment" was "a clearer definition of exactly the same intention as had been expressed in the original phrases." Secretary Houston, on page 651, said that the use of the phrase "net investment" instead of "fair value" would make it more certain what the Government would pay and more certain what the licensee would receive. On page 659 he said the difference is one of "definiteness and clearness"; that under the amendment "both parties would know more clearly how to proceed." On page 694 Secretary Houston said "net investment would furnish a certain basis for the commission in establishing rates, which fair value does not. You would have to debate each time what was meant by 'fair value' and haggle over it."

On page 854 is set out Secretary Houston's letter of March 29, 1918, concerning the relative merits of "fair value" and "net investment." He wrote:

> The term "fair value not to exceed actual cost" is, at the best, indefinite. It was believed advisable, therefore, from the standpoint of the public interest as well as that of the private investor, to make this most important provision of the bill as definite as possible. The term "net investment" has accordingly been used. The maximum price that can be received in event of recapture under this definition is "the actual legitimate original cost" of the property taken. This amount may be considerably reduced by the subtraction to the extent they have been accumulated from earnings in excess of a "fair return" of the items specified in the definition, namely, unappropriated surplus, depreciation balances, amortization reserves, and amounts expended in extensions and betterments. Since this definition by its very language completely excludes from the purchase price every item named in lines 17 to 24 on page 21, those lines are mere repetition of language and were canceled. If there is any possible doubt on this point, the lines could be retained after changing "fair value," in line 17, to "net investment." The use of the term "net investment" made necessary the changes in lines 9 and 10 of page 21. I consider that the amended draft affords the most satisfactory basis for purchase from the public standpoint that has yet been proposed.

Secretary Houston was exactly correct in his analysis of these respective phrases.

No term in economics or jurisprudence has been more debated than the word "value." Its meaning and proper application have been the subject of endless disputation and litigation.

Courts and economic writers in vain have sought to free it from its ambiguity and unscientific character. I do not pose as an expert, but have had some little experience in eminent domain and other cases which taught me the wide and varied interpretation and application of the term "value," whether qualified as "fair value" or "market value," "intrinsic value" or "speculative," and so forth.

"Fair value" without any further limitations would permit the consideration of many tangible and intangible elements of property value. It permits appreciation to be considered, as well as depreciation, and one may offset, increase, or diminish the other. "Fair value," unqualified or unrestricted in meaning or application, varies with the case in which it is employed. It is a "jack-in-the-box" springing up at new and ingenious angles and with a different aspect each time. Its capers elude the most circumspect. Doubtless it was supposed to have been defined and shackled and circumscribed in the form appearing in the original bill, in the form now approved in the minority report. But there, defined and strait-jacketed as it is, it has a vigor and versatility Houdini-like.

We knew, as circumscribed in the original bill, we could lower "fair value" by depreciation, but we did not realize that we left him the vaulting pole of appreciation to raise himself as high, at least, as the bar of actual cost.

To be more explicit, section 14 of the original bill, as printed in the minority report, provided for the United States taking over the project—

upon the condition that before taking possession it shall pay the fair value, not to exceed actual cost of property taken. * * * Provided, That such fair value shall not include or be affected by the value of any lands, rights of way, or other property of the United States, licensed by the commission under this act, by license or by good will, going value, or prospective revenues: Provided further, That the values allowed for water rights, rights of way, land, or interest in lands shall not be in excess of the actual reasonable cost thereof at the time of acquisition by the lessee.

In every decision involving "fair value" appreciation is allowed, as well as depreciation, the only limitation in paragraph 14, which I have read, on appreciation on structures, fixtures, transmission lines, and machinery, and perhaps on other property, is that appreciation shall not make the property valued exceed actual cost. You may have a plant costing $1,000,000 depreciated since construction $250,000, but on account of the increased cost of labor and materials so appreciated that it would cost $1,250,000 to reproduce. The increased cost of reproduction would offset the depreciation, and accordingly the Government would have to pay the $1,000,000 for the plant, the original cost, despite the $250,000 depreciation.

Nothing is said in the attempted limitation about not considering present profits, nothing about the State franchise, which may have appreciated in value. Is the limitation "not to exceed actual cost" applicable to the plant as a whole as an integer or to its component parts? All the factors of "fair value" inhere, unless stricken out, by the limitations of section 14.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has again expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. How much time can I have?

Mr. ESCH. Ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. How much time was yielded first?

Mr. ESCH. Fifteen minutes first and 10 minutes now.

Mr. SINNOTT. Who is wise enough to know that fair value is "cabined, cribbed, coffined, and confined," as we should like to have it? It is risky to try to place a new definition or interpretation on a well-known legal phrase.

In the Denver City Water case the city ordinance in its preamble recited that the water company was without a franchise. Judge Holmes held this to be true, and that for rate-making purposes the property might be considered junk, but the majority opinion held that the franchise could be considered.

Secretary Houston was right when he said "fair value not to exceed actual cost is at best indefinite"; that "the difference is one of definiteness and clearness."

Are you going to estimate fair value by original cost to date, less depreciation, or by reproduction cost now, less depreciation? It has been done both ways. Also market value as a going concern has been considered.

If by the reproduction method, will you allow $140,000, as was allowed by one master, for the estimated cost of taking up a city pavement to relay gas mains?

Fair value also furnishes the measure for rate regulations. Do you want to rehearse these questions every time there is a contest about rate regulation? Secretary Houston well said, "You will have to debate each time what was meant by fair value and haggle over it."

In the case of the City of Denver v. Denver Water Co., decided last March by the United States Supreme Court, in determining the value for rate purposes—lands and water rights were appraised at their present market values; estimates of the cost of reproducing the structures were made, and from this cost allowance for accrued depreciation was deducted, so as to determine the reasonable value of the structures in their present condition; and in estimating the cost of reproduction, it was assumed that the work would be done under contract after fair competitive bidding and with reasonable costs for engineering and superintendence, in addition to the contract cost.

All this increased cost and appreciation of labor, materials, engineering, and superintendence above what it was when the plant was constructed went to offset the depreciation. The city of Denver and the water company haggled for four years, and after eight years the Supreme Court of the United States made the decision I have quoted.

Do we want such complications when we take over these plants? I certainly prefer the "net investment" plan, affording daily data and information for rate regulation, and immediate information of the net investment at the expiration of the license period.

The courts have always treated value for rate-making purposes differently from what they do for acquisition purposes. The minority report would have the same peg for a square and round hole.

In the Texas Midland valuation case, before the Interstate Commerce Commission, nearly 3,000 pages of briefs are on file, largely devoted to the argument as to the meaning of the term value as used in the act of Congress March 1, 1913; 8,224 pages of testimony were taken to determine the value of the Texas Midland road. All of this would be obviated under the net-investment plan.

Mr. Chairman, as I said, I do not claim to be an expert on valuation, but I have made some study of the subject.

One of the most noted experts in the United States is the present commissioner of interstate commerce, Clyde B. Aitchison. He was formerly one of the railway commissioners for the State of Oregon. While acting in that capacity he was selected by the valuation committee of the National Association of Railway Commissioners to act as its solicitor, to reside in this city of Washington. He was subsequently appointed by President Wilson interstate commerce commissioner, which position he now holds.

While solicitor for the valuation committee of the National Association of Railway Commissioners, Mr. A tchison prepared a brief on valuation, which I have had the pleasure of reading. He shows by numerous quotations from authors and court decisions the ambiguities and embarrassment inherent in the use of the term "value."

The first consideration in water-power legislation should be safeguarding of the public interest. After this, if development is had by private capital, with the right of recapture reserved to the public, fairness and definiteness as to the price on retaking should be provided. I am going to quote from Mr. Aitchison's brief certain observations of authors and courts on the term "value." The author states:

Value is a relative term, and when used for one purpose with respect to a public-utility property, identifies a different concept than when used for another purpose as to the same utility.

He adds:

That the term "value" was currently used by valuation experts and writers as representing different concepts, which varied with the purposes of the appraisal, abundantly appears.

He quotes from the 1911 report of the National Association of Railway Commissioners on "Railroad taxation and plans for ascertaining the fair value of railroad property":

We have shown, too, that the term "value" is meaningless unless made with reference to some particular purpose, and that any attempt to find a common single basis of valuation is futile. Progress toward a correct solution of any valuation problem can only be made by directing our thoughts solely toward the specific purpose involved.

He shows that valuation varies with the purpose, whether for taxation, accounting and capitalization, public purchase, or rate making.

Whitten on valuation is quoted:

As the valuation problem develops it becomes increasingly clear that the term "value" may be used in several different senses, and that what is value for one purpose is not necessarily value for another.

Another text writer is quoted in Hammond against Hayes:

It is therefore important in any comprehensive study of the question of values of property to determine how far the methods of valuation employed must be modified to produce the true present value for any one of these four purposes, i. e., rates, taxation, capitalization, public acquisition.

Many writers on this subject have contended that the fair present value of a property must be the same for whatever purpose such value may have been determined, and that in consequence there can be but one method by which the true present value can be obtained. That such is not the case will be apparent when the entire subject of valuation has been fully discussed.

Other experts are quoted:

It is evident to a student of railroad values that it may be quite reasonable to suppose that there may be different methods of arriving at value, depending upon the purpose of arriving at value, depending upon the purpose of determining the value. (Report on revaluation of railroads and canals, New Jersey, Charles Hansel, p. 44.)

The decisions of the Supreme Court and other tribunals on questions of valuation in the rate cases, where the question at issue is as to the reasonable return a corporation is entitled to receive under a public regulation of rates, must be distinguished from eminent domain and analogous cases, where a right of purchase of the property of public utility companies is exercised by municipalities under reserved contract rights, and also from cases of valuation for taxation where the ascertainment of relative value under construction of statutory standards is involved. (Interstate Commerce, F. N. Judson (2d ed.), sec. 124, p. 195.)

Mr. Aitchison writes:

There is not space for a present discussion of the senses in which the term "values" is used by economists as a technical term in their science. Since the days of Aristotle it has been recognized that it has been used in the world of industry in widely different meanings.

The author quotes Jevons:

I must, in the first place, point out the thoroughly ambiguous and unscientific character of the term "value." Adam Smith noticed the extreme difference of meaning between value in use and value in exchange; and it is usual for writers on economics to caution their readers against the confusion of thought to which they are liable. But I do not believe that either writers or readers can avoid confusion so long as they use the word. In spite of the utmost feeling of danger, I often detect myself using the word improperly, nor do I think that the best authors escape the danger.

He quotes from the Missouri Rate case, decided by the United States Supreme Court:

It may be that we may at some future date reach a condition where a single valuation of public-service property could be made to answer all governmental purposes. We have not yet reached that condition. In no case, so far as we are informed, has tax appraisement been accepted by the public utilities commission.

Is it credible that all the doubt and uncertainty expressed in these citations has been solved by the restrictive phraseology accompanying the term "fair value" in the original bill?

Have we any assurance that, guarded as it is, there do not still lurk in ambush elements of value to surprise and plague us?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has again expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Could I have 20 minutes more?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 20 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized for 20 minutes more.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is apparent that a plan adopted and followed by the experts of the Interstate Commerce Commission rather should be followed than the empirical formula contained in the original bill.

I do not know how this term of wide and varied meaning is going to be interpreted by the courts, even hedged in as you think you have it hedged.

We thought we had the Ferris and Adamson water-power bills of 1914 and 1916 safeguarded, but we bungled.

In the Monongahela Navigation Co. case (148 U. S., 341) a case where the United States resumed the control of a river, the defendant company had a franchise to operate steamboats granted by the State. The United States contended that when it resumed control of navigation the State franchise was destroyed. The court held that compensation must be paid, saying "but it can no more take the franchise which the State has given than it can take any private property belonging to an individual."

In the face of the ingenuity of the courts to protect private property, are you satisfied that you have properly restricted this term in derogation of property?

A superficial acceptance of the meaning of the term "net investment" may lead some to think that every dollar invested in the property is to be returned at the end of the license period, and that obsolescence and depreciation are to be ignored in the recapture price. This is not the case. Especial consideration is given to these subjects in section 10, paragraph C, where the licensee is required to make necessary renewals and replacements for the obsolescence he is required to maintain depreciation reserves for that purpose. All of this is under the direct control and authority of the commission.

At the end of the term any sum in the depreciation reserve in excess of a fair return will be deducted from the net investment. There also will be deducted from the net investment unappropriated surplus, amortization reserves, expenditures for additions or betterments, in so far as they are accumulated from earnings in excess of a fair return. All this will be a matter of continuous current record under the direction and supervision of the commission provided for in this bill.

"Fair value" takes no account of these deductions, but at the end of the period deducts depreciation, to be ascertained, doubtless at the end of a long controversy or litigation, involving the vexatious questions of cost to date, less depreciation, and the further question of the legal interpretation of "fair value" as defined and limited. Also there will enter into the "fair-value" determination a dispute as to the proper assignment of various expenditures, whether to operating expenses or capital account, all matters of current record and adjustment under net investment, properly assigned and explained in the classification account of Interstate Commerce Commission. If the adequate depreciation reserves are maintained, as they are required to be under "net investment" for each unit of property, they will represent the difference between the first cost of that unit and the value of its remaining useful life, to be available by the Government on recapture, added to its other advantages.

Surely the certainty and definiteness accompanying "net investment" will result in cheaper interest in financing any project to be reflected in cheaper rates to consumer. While with "fair value," for the contrary reason, higher interest rates, and consequently higher rates to the consumer, will ensue.

For these reasons I believe the recapture price should be governed by the rules adopted by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

WHERE ROLLS THE OREGON.

Mr. Chairman, I want to see the development of the 40,000,000 horsepower accredited to the West, the 20,000,000 horsepower accredited to the Columbia River basin. It was there I was born, at The Dalles, at the end of the "old Oregon Trail," near the edge of what was once known as the Great American Desert. Here the beautiful panorama of the Columbia River spread before the pioneer. Here it was that the weary immigrant homeseeker, after months of toilsome trekking across the plains, "shook the depths of the desert gloom with his hymn of lofty cheer" as the Columbia came into view.

Here he embarked in the bateau of the Hudson Bay voyageur for the evergreen of the Willamette Valley.

THE INLAND SEA.

A great inland sea once covered eastern Oregon, Washington, and parts of Idaho, so geologists tell us, and immediately west of The Dalles it broke through the barrier of the Cascade Range in some titanic convulsion of nature.

The Indian legend is that Mount Hood and Mount Adams, once espoused, engaged in a mighty marital combat, whose struggles broke the mountain barrier, and the inland sea disappeared through the gorge of the Columbia.

The Indian's awe even now bears witness to the tribe's tradition. From his canoe, as he glides through the Columbia's gorge, he sees the two mythical mates of a Miocene age, Hood and Adams, now hiding behind the towering hills, ever and anon, through favorable gaps in the gorge, stealing furtive peeps each at the other.

It may be so. Perhaps the Indian "who sees God in the wind" witnessed some colossal cataclysm of nature. The surroundings bear evidence of the epochal. A broad river suddenly turns on edge at train speed, rushes through a gash in the lava flow. Palisades, a sheer thousand feet, dwarfing the Hudson's, rise from the water's edge. Giant causeways abound, dwarfing Erin's.

CRATER LAKE.

Southward, Crater Lake, "the sea of silence," cauldronlike and circular, 7,000 feet high, is perched amid the peaks. Perpendicular sides of slaggy lava rise over 1,000 feet from waters of indigo blue 6 miles across and 2,000 feet deep. To the scientist, a mighty volcano collapsed within itself, Mount Mazama, 15,000 feet high, telescoped.

To me a shell hole of a war of worlds. Who knows?

Could the great blind poet have seen this marvel ere his pen had Lucifer and his host of rebel angels—

Hurled headlong flaming from the etheral sky
With hideous ruin and combustion, down—in Miltonic imagery here he'd have found the impact.

OUR RESERVOIRS.

Amphitheaterlike the hills rise and radiate from the Columbia to the cardinal points, hill piling on hill, rising in the blue-purple haze of twilight like billows, suddenly stilled on the crest, till the rim of the amphitheater and horizon from central Oregon is pillared with a dozen lofty, eternal, snow-capped peaks, once blazing beacons, now only reflecting above the dusk of the valleys, from lofty eminences of snow and ice, the soft pink glow of the setting sun as the day drops into the westward waters of the Pacific.

These snow caps eternal are our reservoirs.

THE HAND OF THE GREAT ARCHITECT.

Whether you look at the sublime landscape with the eye of the scientist or through the Indian's legendary lore you see how the hand of the Great Architect hewed for the future.

The waters, once slowly seeking the inland sea, now toss and tumble in cataracts from "the Cascade's frozen gorges," exhaustless in energy and power, awaiting man's will.

I have seen much of the development of this part of the West—the final retreat of the Indians to their reservations, the departure of the cattle baron, the advent of the sheepman, the coming of the homesteader, each contesting proprietorship.

Though we had many favored localities, we were wont to question the wisdom of the Master Hand that heaped the mountains when some sojourner told us of the easily tilled prairies of the corn belt. When he spoke of the copious rains and abundant crops of his home we envied that clime and questioned the wasteful hand of the Great Architect that scattered the immense arid and semiarid belts and plateaus of the great inland empire. We could see no Divine foresight or plan in the great depth of prolific and fertile volcanic ash, covering immense areas, devoid of all save a scanty rainfall, with snow-clad mountains pouring their inaccessible waters into deep gorges and canyons.

From a scenic standpoint all seemed majestic and sublime, but we felt we were surfeited with scenery. From the point of utility we would have improved on the designs of the Great Architect.

Our finite minds could not fathom the infinite purpose. We did not appreciate the "precious jewel" in all that seemed ugly and forbidding when pioneer-day material wants alone were considered.

The possibilities of "white coal" were way beyond the ken of the pioneer; they are almost beyond the scope even of our own imagination. But we have at last come to a realization of the rich resources the prodigal and bounteous hand of nature has placed at our disposal.

We are skeptics no longer.

The development, through the slow processes of the past, the requirement of countless acres for the bleating, lowing herds, the slow upbuilding of a frontier by the weary and intermittent toil of the homesteader with meager means to improve, the idle year of the summer fallow, the drought, the parch and shrivel of the eastern wind, will no longer be witnessed if we are wise enough to pass laws to put the turbine in our mountain torrents, the life-giving waters on our arid, thirsty soils.

Thus, and only thus, will His design be consummated "where rolls the Oregon." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am going to set out in the RECORD two or three examples, and in some of these cases you will find that on recapture the price paid under net investment is much below the price paid under the fair-value plan upheld and defended by the minority report. But I shall not further trespass upon the time of the House in going into those matters. This is such a big, broad subject, and it has so many ramifications to it, that it is almost impossible to discuss it in an entire day, and I appreciate the patience of the committee. [Applause.]

I append to my remarks the following:

Here are sets of tables showing comparison between the prices which will be paid for a property under the recapture provisions of the water-power bill, according to whether the price is based upon "fair value not to exceed actual cost," or upon "net investment."

The price to be paid on the "fair-value" basis will vary in proportion to the relative prices of labor and materials at the date of construction and at the date of recapture. The price to be paid on the "net-investment" basis will vary according to the prosperity of the business—that is, according to whether the licensee receives earnings which will permit of establishing depreciation and amortization reserves.

In all cases it is assumed that the original cost of the property is $5,000,000; that the accrued physical depreciation at the end of the license period is 20 per cent; that the "aggregate credit balance" of depreciation reserves is $1,000.000; and that the total of the amortization reserve when set up is also $1,000,000.

The figures for the "fair-value" basis assume three conditions: First, a 20 per cent increase in prices of labor and materials; second, no change in prices of labor and materials; and, third, a 20 per cent decrease in prices of labor and materials.

The figures on the "net-investment" basis assume three conditions: First, that depreciation reserves set up by the licensee are at the expense of a "fair return," and that no amortization reserves at all are established; second, that the licensee is able to earn a fair return in addition to maintaining the depreciation reserve, but does not earn enough to set up an amortization reserve; and, third, that the licensee is able to earn a fair return and to maintain both amortization and depreciation reserves.

Each of the three examples on the "net-investment" basis should be compared with each example under the "fair-value" basis; for example, when, under the assumption of constant prices, the licensee would receive $4,000,000 for his property on the "fair-value" basis, he might receive on the "net-investment" basis $5,000,000, $4,000,000, or $3,000,000, according to whether he had or had not been able to maintain depreciation and amortization reserves in addition to a fair return. Similarly, with the condition of rising prices, on a "fair-value" basis, the example given would require the payment of $4,800,000, while the price on the "net-investment" basis might be $5,000,000, $4,000,000, or $3,000,000. It by no means follows, therefore, that the "fair-value" basis of settlement is more favorable from the public standpoint. On the "fair-value" basis the licensee assumes all risk of loss and is not required to share any profits with the public; that is, it is on a wholly speculative basis. Under the "net-investment" basis, on the other hand, the element of risk is largely eliminated; and the public, which fixes, through its governmental agencies, the rate of return which a licensee may receive, will share in the profits of the enterprise if they exceed in any degree a fair return upon the investment.

The chief value of the "net-investment" basis, from the standpoint both of the licensee and the public, is the elimination of uncertainties and the reduction of the speculative element to the minimum. This means a less cost of capital, and, consequently, a less cost for the service.

In figuring these examples I have not taken into consideration the possibility of the court construing "fair value" more liberally than the construction its proponents place on it, but have accepted their construction.

I.

On basis of "fair value."

	A. Prices of labor and material increasing during license period.	B. Prices of labor and material unchanged through license period.	C. Prices of labor and material decreasing during license period.
Original cost of property	$5,000,000	$5,000,000	$5,000,000
Replacement cost of property	6,000,000	5,000,000	4,000,000
Accrued physical depreciation	1,200,000	1,000,000	800,000
Licensee will receive for property	4,800,000	4,000,000	3,200,000

II.

On basis of "net investment."

	A. Licensee unable to maintain depreciation reserves, except at the expense of "Fair return." No amortization reserves maintained.	B. Licensee able to earn "Fair return" and to maintain depreciation reserves in addition, but not to maintain amortization reserves.	C. Licensee able to earn "Fair return" and to maintain in addition both depreciation and amortization reserves.
Original cost of property	$5,000,000	$5,000,000	$5,000,000
Reserves in excess of "fair return" depreciation		1,000,000	1,000,000
Amortization			1,000,000
Licensee will receive for property	5,000,000	4,000,000	3,000,000

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] such time as he desires to use.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, four times within the last six years the House of Representatives have passed water-power bills, two coming from the Public Lands Committee, of which I have the honor to be chairman; two coming from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, and each time they have contained, either as originally reported or pursuant to amendments made on the floor, the salient features of correct water-power policy. Whenever any of the salient features of the water-power policy were wanting in the bills as they came from the committee, the House of Representatives have promptly amended them, whipped the several bills into shape, and sent them to the Senate in proper form.

The salient features of a correct and adequate water-power policy are so well understood, so well marked out, that it is scarcely necessary to again recite them, but in the interest of clarity and in the interest of the fact that this bill by a committee amendment materially departs from a correct waterpower policy, it is well to again enumerate them. They are as follows:

First. No legislation, Executive order, or departmental ruling should permit the patenting or the title in fee to pass out of the Federal Government under any conditions. The fee title should be reserved in perpetuity to the United States.

Second. The dam sites should be leased for a period of time not longer than 50 years, without any entangling alliances or phrases difficult to understand on which the courts might quibble or debate as to the relative rights of the Federal Government and the lessee after the term has expired.

Third. The recapture provision should provide that all nonperishable property, such as land, water rights, dam sites, good will, and so forth, should go back to the Federal Government at actual cost, and that all perishable property in connection with the plant should come back to the Federal Government at the end of the lease at its fair value. In both cases the interest of the public is conserved and made certain.

Fourth. Strong, clear, well-understood provisions should be inserted in the lease contract for the revocation of the permit for a violation of the conditions thereof.

Fifth. Provisions should be inserted in the lease requiring diligence and prompt construction of the plant, so that the property may not be held for speculative purposes.

Sixth. A royalty or rental for the use of the dam sites and the property of the Federal Government should be required in all cases, except for municipalities which furnish current to consumers without profit.

Seventh. The Federal Government should at all times maintain its paramountcy and full control.

Eighth. Annual reports should be exacted from the power companies, so that the public might at all times know of their acts and doings.

Ninth. The Federal Government should reserve to itself full power to fix rates for service, capitalization, bond issues, and so forth, in interstate projects and, where there is no public utilities commission for this purpose, in intrastate projects.

Tenth. Each lease, permit, or consent of Congress should contain a provision that upon proof that any such permittees, lessees, or grantees have conspired to prevent the development of water power or to limit the output of already constructed plants the lease should be revocable in a court of competent jurisdiction.

Of the salient features just enumerated by me the one most important of all is what is commonly known as the "recapture clause." The recapture clause, of course, is that provision in the bill which lays down the measurement of the damages or the price the Government must pay to regain their property which has been licensed or leased away for a term of years. The only thing that distinguishes a license or lease for a term of years from a grant in perpetuity is our ability to regain or recapture it, get it away from the grantee, and return it to the original grantor. If the recapture clause be carefully written and is in the public interest, it will be easy to recover it to the Government or the rightful owner thereof; but, on the contrary, if the recapture clause is poorly written, complexly written, and with phrases of doubtful meaning, it will be difficult for the licensing power to recapture, regain it, retake, and again possess it, and again have it for the benefit of the people to whom it belongs.

That bill contained the following proposal:

* * * upon condition that it shall pay, before taking possession, first, the actual costs of rights of way, water rights, lands, and interests therein purchased and used by the lessee in the generation and distribution of electrical energy under the lease, and, second, the reasonable value of all other property taken over, including structures and fixtures acquired, erected, or placed upon the lands and included in the generation or distribution plant, and which are dependent as hereinabove set forth, such reasonable * * *.

Thus it will be observed that the correct principle is here preserved. Thus it will be observed that at the time of retaking neither the Government, State, county, or municipality who seeks to retake it and make it their own is compelled to pay for anything they do not get. The increase in the growth of the nonperishable property is preserved for the grantor instead of allowing it to accumulate for the benefit of the grantee, to the detriment of and the expense of the people who must ultimately pay the price of its retaking. This is thought to be clearly in the public's interest. It is thought that this provision contains the correct principle. This is thought to give the investor all he is entitled to and at the same time preserve in the public interest the rights of the Government.

* * * before taking possession the fair value of such property, such value to be determined by mutual agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the lessee, and, in case they can not agree, by proceedings instituted in the United States district court for that purpose: Provided, That such fair value shall not include or be affected by the value of any public lands, rights of way, franchises, or other property leased or granted under this act by the United States or by the good will or prospective revenues.

Again it will be observed that after most careful scrutiny by members of the committee, by Members of the House, by Secretary Lane, and by all of the water-power experts who had given attention to the subject, the bill passed, carrying an adequate recapture clause and all the other salient features of a correct and adequate water-power policy.

Thus it will be observed that the bill as it then passed and was agreed to carried no assurance on the part of the Federal Government that they would pay back to the water-power developer all of this investment, as is provided for in the committee amendment to the pending bill.

[Extracts from recapture clause of the water-power bill from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, which passed the House Aug. 4, 1914.]

* * * Before taking possession, the United States or the person authorized by Congress shall pay therefor (1) the actual cost of the grantee of lands or any interests therein purchased and used by the grantee in the generation and distribution of power, and (2) the fair value of other properties taken over, together with the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks or other aids to navigation and all other capital expenditures required by the United States in assuming all contracts for electrical energy extending beyond the granting period which have had or may have the approval of the Secretary of War and which were entered in good faith and at a reasonable rate.

Thus it will be observed that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the House of Representatives on that occasion again passed a bill carrying a correct recapture clause, so that the people might pay the fair value of the property without becoming an insurer of the investment, without relieving the water-power developer of any risk in connection with the transaction, and without in any sense departing from the combined judgment of all of the departments, both of the committees who had had jurisdiction of the water-power legislation and the House of Representatives, who had gone into this matter in great detail and reached a careful conclusion about it.

[Extracts from the recapture clause of the Adamson substitute of the Shields bill which passed the House July 14, 1916.]

The following provision is to be found in section 10 of the Adamson bill, which provides the method of retaking, recapturing, and the measurement of damages to be paid upon its retaking. It is as follows:

* * * upon condition that it shall pay before taking possession, first, the reasonable value, not exceeding the actual costs of the dam or diversion structure and locks, and all other aids to navigation constructed under the approval of plans and specifications, rights of way, water rights, lands, and interest therein purchased or taken over by it. * * *

It will be observed that it contains no assurance that the Government will return every dollar of the capital invested and thereby become an insurer of all the money invested in a given project, and I submit that that is as it should be.

It will be remembered that this bill was unanimously reported from the Public Lands Committee, was unanimously passed through the House of Representatives, had the unanimous indorsement of all the departments, and was carefully scrutinized during long tedious hearings wherein departmental officers attended, participated in, and helped to make certain that the correct principles were incorporated.

Again, it will be observed that in this instance the public, in order to regain the property, is only compelled to pay as a condition precedent the reasonable value, which in no instance shall exceed the actual cost.

Again, it will be observed that the public interest is thus conserved by only being required to pay the actual value of the thing retaken as distinguished from paying the actual amount invested.

[Extracts from the recapture clause of the administration water-power bill as it was originally prepared without the committee amendment.]

Section 14 of the administration water-power bill, as it was prepared and agreed upon, contained the following language:

* * * upon the condition that before taking possession it shall pay the fair value not to exceed actual cost of property taken, plus such reasonable severance damages, if any, as may be caused by the separation of said property from property valuable, serviceable, and dependent as above set forth, but not taken, and shall assume all contracts entered into by the licensee with the approval of the commission.

Thus it will be observed that the administration water-power bill as originally framed and as originally presented provided that in the event of retaking, the Government or the licensing authority shall only be required to pay the fair value, which shall not in any case exceed the actual cost of the property thus taken.

I submit this is the correct rule, and is as it should be. I submit there can be no justification for Congress providing that the licensing authority shall pay a greater sum at the time of recapture than the property is actually worth at its fair value, and they should not in any event pay more than the actual cost.

It should at all times be remembered that this bill in its original form was drafted through the joint efforts of Secretaries Lane, Baker, and Houston. It should at all times be remembered that this bill in its original form was delivered to President Wilson as a net result of their combined efforts. It should at all times be remembered that the bill in this form was by President Wilson presented at a White House conference to a subcommittee of the House Public Lands Committee, Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, the Agricultural Committee, and the Rules Committee, and that at the time it came up to the Capitol for consideration it had no net investment provision. It had no provision making the Government an insurer as to every dollar invested by the promoter, but adhered strictly to the provisions contained in the four previous water-power bills that had passed the House of Representatives after the greatest deliberation and consideration.

[Extracts from the recapture clause as proposed in the net-investment provision in the committee amendment in sec. 14.]

* * * upon the condition that before taking possession it shall pay the net investment of the licensee in the project or projects taken, plus such reasonable damages, if any, to property of the licensee valuable, serviceable, and dependent as above set forth, but not taken, as may be caused by the severance therefrom of property taken, and shall assume all contracts entered into by the licensee with the approval of the commission.

It will be observed that this provision differs from all the others in that this provision is entirely new, that this provision does not only require the Government at the time of retaking to pay the actual fair value of the property, but instead provides as a condition precedent to any retaking of the property that they must pay the net invesment of the project or projects of the licensee, plus any reasonable damages, if any, to the property of the licensee, either valuable, serviceable, or dependent thereon.

This would require the Government, the State, the county, or the municipality at the time of retaking not to pay what the property was actually worth in order to recover it, but they must pay the actual net investment, which, stripped of all the mysticism, means they must pay back to the investor every dollar he put into it.

I submit that no such principle can be defended here or elsewhere. I submit this shifts all the risk, hazard, and dangers incident to development from the shoulders of the speculator and the developer over on to the shoulders of the Government of the United States.

I submit this requires the Government, who now owns the property, to part with it and at the same time insure the licensee who uses it that in no event can he lose a cent he puts into it, and which to me is a one-sided bargain, an inequitable trade, an unconscionable performance that neither this Congress or any that succeeds it should ever countenance or assent to.

FOUR LEADING CONTENTIONS OF WATER-POWER DEVELOPERS.

The water-power interests of the United States may be classified into three groups:

First. The water-power developers and promoters.

Second. Bond brokers who lend the money at high rates of interest on promotion schemes.

Third. Hydroelectric engineers who are either associated with the water-power developers or expect to secure employment from them.

These three classes of citizens have for the last number of years been vigilant in their efforts to secure the passage of water-power legislation which should be fashioned along the lines of their desires. The principal and salient provisions they have voted for are as follows:

First. It has been their determined effort to secure from the Government the Nation's valuable water-power resources in perpetuity as distinguished from a term of years.

Four times in previous Congresses this contention has been denied them, and it has been denied them in this bill. They made a vigilant effort to secure it, as the hearings will disclose. But the committee, in their wisdom, would have none of it, and preserved in the bill the provision which provides that the license or lease shall not extend for a greater period than 50 years.

Their second contention was that the grant should be made free from any rental or royalty to the Government of the United States. In other words, they wanted the Government to part from its property without rental and without price. Four times this contention has been passed upon by the House of Representatives and four times the House of Representatives have refused it to them. They were unsuccessful in getting it incorporated in this bill. They were unsuccessful in getting a maximum rate beyond which the Government could not go.

Your Committee on Water Power has succeeded in holding the bill intact and making it possible for the Federal Government to get some revenue from these valuable properties that they are thus asked to part with.

Their third contention has always been to avoid as far as possible Federal control or regulation of any sort. Four times in preceding Congresses this contention has been passed upon, and each time the House of Representatives has refused them their wishes. It has been refused them in this bill. I hope it will be refused them in all succeeding bills. The Government should at all times maintain full power over the water-power interests of the country. It deals with such a vital necessity that the Government should never part company with it but should always retain control over it.

Their fourth contention has always been if it were impossible to secure a grant in perpetuity, then to secure the adoption of recapture clause, which would be drafted in such a way that neither court, Government, Cabinet, or constituency could ever get it away from them.

Four times in preceding Congresses this effort has aborted and the Congress has refused them what they asked. On this occasion, tacked on as a committee amendment to the administration water-power bill that had been previously carefully drawn and carefully agreed upon, they have inserted the so-called net investment proposal heretofore referred to, which requires the Government to become an absolute insurer of the investment of the promoter and as a condition precedent to any retaking of the property every dollar of his investment must be refunded to him, repaid to him, before the Government can reassert its rights, and get hold of its property, which it is by this bill asked to part company with.

I have no more responsibility for this legislation than any other Member of the House. I have little water power in my entire State. I am not prompted by an active constituency on this proposition. They know little of it. They have been little educated on the subject. They are not for the moment actively or vitally interested in it. What I have said has been prompted by a conscience that the 60,000,000 potential horsepower of hydroelectrical energy in the United States should not be allowed to slip away from us, get into the hands of monopoly where extortion either could or would be practiced.

I may be oversensitive, I may be overwrought about the dangers incident to the parting with this most extraordinary of all our natural resources, but to me the fact that it is unlike all other resources, and the further fact that nothing is consumed in the using, and the further fact that we can trace this most material agent, the water, every step of the way, as it finds its way from ocean to cloud, from cloud to rain, from rain to stream, from stream to river, from highlands to lowlands, and back again to the mother ocean from whence it came. And we can again follow it step by step on its way, ceaseless and never ending in its limitless and continuous orbs. By preserving these water-power sites where the water falls from the highlands to the lowlands and by attaching to it modern machinery, turbine wheels, and other electrical paraphernalia, we halter it, bridle it, harness it, and it brings heat, light, and power to every living thing.

The water as it passes on over the turbine wheel may be used for domestic purposes, irrigation, or even again and again for electric purposes without diminution, without deterioration, without any resource being consumed in the using.

I confess this most interesting subject to-day is used by every citizen, from the humblest to the greatest; it lights our streets, our homes; it lifts our elevators; it runs our traction lines; it cooks our food—in short, it heats, it lights, it moves the world. It is the greatest agency of all agencies. It is ours. They ask it of us. It is ours to give. It is theirs to receive. Do we do wrong in using caution in incorporating conditions for its use that will retain this blessing for all the people as distinguished from a few of the people?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, as I have spoken without preparation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman also asks to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, how much time did the gentleman use?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes, or so much of that time as he may need, to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. WALTON].

Mr. WALTON. Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask the indulgence of the Members of this House and not speak to the bill under discussion. I want to take the time allotted to me to reply to a vicious and slanderous attack upon the loyalty and the patriotism of over 50 per cent of the people of the State of New Mexico which appeared in a recent issue of a well-known publication. I can not allow such an attack to go unchallenged. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that after I have proceeded for a very few moments you will agree that I am justified in making this digression; that I could not do otherwise.

Mr. Chairman, at a time when the United States is engaged in a war for the most sacred rights of humanity—a war in which all patriots are burying their personal differences in the great common cause for liberty; a war in which it is of the utmost importance that all of us should work together with all our physical, mental, and moral strength—at such a time it seems inconceivable that there should be in all this land a man with a mind so dark and a soul so small as to utter a monstrous libel against a large body of patriotic Americans who are doing all and giving all for their country.

It seems even more inconceivable, Mr. Chairman, that where such a man exists there should be found in the United States a magazine recognized as a reputable publication which would give utterance to his libel; would send forth through the mails, with utter disregard for truth or without stopping to ascertain the truth, a glaring, flagrant attack on the people of the State which I have the honor to represent—a people who are as true and loyal as live within the borders of any State in this Union.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, my attention has been called to a contribution on pages 312, 313, and 314 of the August number of the North American Review, entitled "America's Unguarded Gateway," bearing the signature of Henry Wray, Kansas City, Mo., which for absolute and overwhelming mendacity puts to shame anything ever written by the most accomplished liar in the pay of the German Kaiser, and which, for the effect that it is calculated to produce in this time of war, might well have been written by one of the Kaiser's agents.

The lies are so innumerable in this contribution that they can not all be quoted. Suffice it to say, it is alleged that New Mexico is governed by Penitentes; her courts and juries are owned by Penitentes; "Americans who learn too much are found on the highways, their hearts decorated with neat perforations. It is whispered that no one can talk against the conditions of New Mexico and live."

The Federal and State courts—

It is alleged—

obey the mandates of the Penitentes, and no Penitente is ever convicted in court, whatever the evidence. If any juror votes for a verdict contrary to the instructions of this organization, he moves quickly or forever after ceases to move.

In the lower courts the accused is presumed to be guilty until he proves his innocence.

Americans tried by a Penitente jury for an offense against the Penitentes are likely to be held indefinitely in a filthy jail kept by a Penitente sheriff; some have been so held, without trial or attention, until they died.

After Villa made his raid on Columbus the Mexican population of the State openly boasted of what they intended to do. On the Denver & Rio Grande Railway between Alamosa, Colo., and Santa Fe the natives made the male passengers hurrah for Villa and inflicted unprintable outrages upon the women passengers. * * * At Lamy the Mexicans boasted of what they were going to do to the Americans, and the Americans moved.

The Interior Department has allowed homestead sites where the land can not be cultivated. These sites are used chiefly to obstruct roads and annoy the Forest Department and real settlers. Congress has legalized the stealing of millions of feet of lumber from Government lands. * * * Mining districts are idle. * * * Elections in New Mexico are farces, and bribery is rampant. * * * As far north as Colorado newspapers speak of Americans as "foreigners." A state of treason exists in this part of our country. * * * New Mexico confidently expects to rise and again join the mother country. * * * The native population awaits the hour to strike. When some German emissary furnishes the money to some pirate in Mexico that hour will be at hand.

It is declared that, tracing the route from El Paso to Santa Fe and Alamosa, you have outlined the way—along which an invading (Mexican) army could pass unhindered, unresisted, and not unwelcomed. Over nearly the entire route the enemy would be acclaimed, fed, quartered, equipped, and recruited.

Were it not that some of the people of the United States have seemed to be in absolute ignorance of conditions in the West, and especially the Southwest, I would not expend the breath necessary to make an answer to this classic in libel and epic in vicious slander. Were it not that the North American Review is a magazine of standing in contemporary periodical journalism and its editor a man who for many years has played a conspicuous rôle in the political history of his time, I would be content to let the infamous libel expend itself on the empty air of an unheeding circulation. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that facts may develop to show that the editor of the magazine has been imposed upon in the publication of this article, for I believe him to be a man big enough, of sufficient broad mind, to realize the wrong that he has done, and that he will endeavor to make suitable and proper reparation. But the times and the circumstances demand that the lies should not go unchallenged, and I shall ask the indulgence of this House while I briefly refute a wretched slander upon a large portion of my constituency and tell the truth about a brave, a loyal, a patriotic, and a progressive people.

The gist of the argument of "America's unguarded gateway" is that the Spanish-American population of New Mexico is not loyal to the United States; that a Mexican army, raised by German influence and paid by German gold, would have no difficulty in invading this country through New Mexico; but, on the other hand, it would be encouraged, recruited, and rationed by the Spanish-Americans of that State.

This lie is so grotesque Mr. Chairman, that it would be cause for laughter did it not attack the honor and patriotism of a proud and sensitive people. The record of New Mexico during the Civil War speaks for itself. The showing of the State in the War with Spain proves conclusively that not only is the native population of New Mexico loyal to America, but it is loyal even against Spain itself.

When trouble with Mexico became acute in 1916 and the National Guard was called out to guard the Mexican border it was the New Mexico National Guard, Mr. Chairman, composed of about one-half Spanish-American boys, that was first to respond and that was first on duty on the border. They were stationed at Columbus, one of the danger points of the entire boundary line. They spent 11 months of the hardest sort of camp drudgery and were the last of all the National Guard units to be relieved from service. And these Spanish-American boys, called upon to protect their State from Mexican invasion, made as fine a showing as any guardsmen on the border. These are the people, Mr. Chairman, that are denounced in the North American Review as disloyal—as being willing to support and ration a Mexican army under German influence for the invasion of the United States.

Thousands of Spanish-American youths are now proudly wearing the khaki of the American Army, some of them having already made the supreme sacrifice for the cause of liberty. Millions of dollars invested by Spanish-American citizens of New Mexico in liberty bonds and war saving stamps attest their devotion to the country which has protected them and for which they are willing to give their lives.

Buttressing this lie, which is the mainspring of his argument, the Kansas City correspondent tells so many smaller lies that it is impossible for me to reply to them in detail in the time allotted me. The one that "New Mexico has remained Mexican in every sense of the word" is plainly intended to convey an inference that the Spanish-American population of New Mexico is one in sympathy and interest with the peon of Mexico.

The Spanish-Americans of New Mexico are descendants of the Conquistadores, who wrested the Southwest from the savage tribes of Indians. The blood of nobility flows in their veins. They are courageous, truthful, upright, and honorable. For 75 years they and their ancestors have been living under progressive American institutions. They are law-abiding, peaceful, and industrious.

In this article, Mr. Chairman, the charge is made that Spanish is largely spoken in New Mexico. This is true to an extent, just as it is true that French is spoken in Louisiana, Scandinavian in the Northwest, Finnish in Michigan, and "57 different varieties" in New York, Chicago, Boston, and other large centers. The State constitution provides that the public schools shall always be conducted in English, and the only exceptions are where Spanish is taught as a separate subject or where Spanish may be used in explaining the meaning of English words to Spanish-speaking pupils who do not understand English. And, Mr. Chairman, there is no more beautiful language in the world than Spanish, and especially at the present time is a knowledge of the Spanish language becoming more and more important in our commercial and our business life. To possess a knowledge of Spanish is a qualification of which anyone may be proud.

And, speaking of New Mexico schools, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this committee, I wish that each of you could go, as I have gone, through some of the rural schools of New Mexico and see these little Spanish-American children who, with their parents, are the subject of this libel. All over the State new schoolhouses—clean, well-ventilated, well-lighted—dot the landscape. Over each schoolhouse is an American flag. In every schoolroom the little ones are taught what that flag means; that it means freedom within the law, equal opportunity, justice, and right. They are taught to sing the patriotic American songs. They are taught what it means to be an American. And I say to you here that they are growing up to be far better Americans in every essential sense of the word than the man who uses his half-baked knowledge of the English language and of American history to traduce them and their people.

In that part of the attack on New Mexico which refers to the so-called "Penitentes" the correspondent of the North American Review has merely in his article repeated a lot of old women's tales which have in times past been told of this organization and which have been stoutly denied and repudiated. The statement that "the deserts are dotted with their Calvary crosses, at which human crucifixions are annually carried out," and that "the Federal and State courts obey the mandates of the Penitentes and no Penitente is ever convicted in court, no matter what the evidence," are simply bald lies, which no one with ordinary reasoning powers and ordinary opportunities for observation could conceivably be brought to believe.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that I have touched upon all of the principal points in this publication affecting the Spanish-American people of New Mexico which can be considered of the least importance, but in order that nothing may be overlooked, I desire to emphatically brand as unqualifiedly false the statements that the use of the Spanish language, when necessary for the proceedings of court, the legislature, or other assemblies constitute any just reflection upon the loyalty of the people; that there is any secret or other organization that improperly influences the court, the legislature, election machinery, local administration, or any element of public or private life; that the United States Government or any of its departments has wrongfully deprived any of our citizens of their rights or improperly extended any of their privileges.

I have lived in New Mexico for more than 27 years, and I believe that if anybody knows the Spanish-American people of that State I do. In my personal relations with them I have always found them warm-hearted, generous, and hospitable. In politics no man can claim the Spanish-American vote as his own, for they vote their convictions and they divide along lines of principle and their own conception of what is right, Mr. Wray to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Chairman, I would consider myself unworthy to hold a seat in this House if I sat silent in the face of this cruel, wanton, and deliberate slander. The people of New Mexico have been systematically abused for years by all sorts of publications. We have grown accustomed to the slanders and libels; we have become calloused to the assaults of the ignorant and vicious; but this insult is just a little more than we can stand, because it strikes at our honor.

So, for God's sake, Mr. Chairman, if there must be some among us to rock the boat at this time; if there must be some who have not enough to do fighting the Hun and must fight their fellow Americans, let them, in the name of decency, tell the truth. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. DOOLITTLE].

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, are they the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. They are a summary of the Federal Trade Commission report on the packers' investigation.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not include any printed articles written by outside persons?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It consists of extracts from the report and parts of the evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The matter is as follows:

THE MEAT OF THE MEAT PACKERS' COMBINATION.

(Extracts from Federal Trade Commission's report to President Wilson.)

The Federal Trade Commission, at President Wilson's direction, has made a year's searching investigation of the five big packers—Swift, Armour, Morris, Wilson (the old Schwarzchild & Sulsberger Co. under a new name), and Cudahy Packing Co.—in their relation to the food industry, and the President has given the public the facts. The following is a digest, in form of quotations, of the more important points in the 50-page summary of the report:

The commission's letter submitting the summary says:

"Answering directly your question as to whether or not there exist 'monopolies, controls, trusts, combinations, conspiracies, or restraints of trade out of harmony with the law and the public interest,' we have found conclusive evidence that warrants an unqualified affirmative.

"This evidence in summary form accompanies this letter, and will be set forth in more detailed form in seven reports in support of our findings and recommendations. * * *.

"If these five great concerns owned no packing plants and killed no cattle and still retained control of the instruments of transportation, of marketing, and of storage, their position would not be less strong than it is."

"Out of the mass of information in our hands one fact stands out with all possible emphasis. The small dominant group of American meat packers are now international in their activities, while remaining American in identity. Blame which now attaches to them for their practices abroad, as well as at home, inevitably will attach to our country if the practices continue. * * * This urgently argues for a solution which will increase and not diminish the high regard in which this people is held in international comity.

"Some show of competition is staged by the five great packing companies. It is superficial. There is the natural rivalry of officials and departments, and this is made much of as indicating the existence of real competition. It is not real. * * *

"Some independent packers exist by sufferance of the fire, and a few hardy ones have survived in real competition. * * *."

Speaking of the commission's staff on this investigation, the letter says:

"These men have met and overcome every obstacle that ingenuity and money could devise to impede them. Space forbidding individual mention, we make this general acknowledgment, and this seems the proper time to call to your attention again and especially the work of Mr. Francis J. Heney, whose conduct of the case, because of its success, has met with condemnation, misrepresentation, and criticism. We contrast Mr. Heney's legal ethics with the legal ethics of the men by whom he was opposed."

The summary of the report is closely packed with facts and with copies of letters and documents found in the files of the packers. The summary states:

"The detailed evidence, including hundreds of documents taken from the files of the packing companies, about 9,000 pages of sworn testimony, and many thousand pages of field reports of agents of the commission has been carefully analyzed and digested, and will be laid before the President as rapidly as the various sections can be put in final form."

Of the untrustworthiness of the packers' reports to the commission, the summary says:

"* * * The reports of some of the most important corporations and the statements of their officials could not be accepted. Thus, Armour & Co. in their report, attested by the vice president, Arthur Meeker, among other falsifications, omitted the company's interest in the Chicago Stock Yards, amounting to $1,552,000. * * *."

As an evidence of the willfulness of this omission, it cites that "* * * Arthur Meeker, on June 6, 1916, stated before the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives that 'the Armour people have no interest in the Chicago stockyards.'

"The commission is also in possession of documentary evidence that a committee was formed by Swift & Co. to 'coach' employees who might be called upon to testify or give information to the agents of this commission and other Government bodies."

Again, the commission says:

"The combination among the Big Five is not a casual agreement brought about by indirect and obscure methods, but a definite and positive conspiracy for the purpose of regulating purchases of live stock and controlling the price of meat, the terms of the conspiracy being found in certain documents which are in our possession. * * *

"The Armour, Swift, Morris, and Wilson interests have entered into a combination with certain foreign corporations by which export shipments of beef, mutton, and other meats from the principal South American meat-producing countries are apportioned among the several companies on the basis of agreed percentages. * * *

"Since the meat supplies of North and South America constitute practically the only sources from which the United States and her allies can satisfy their needs for their armies, navies, and civil populations, these two agreements constitute a conspiracy * * * to monopolize an essential of the food of the United States, England, France, and Italy.

"The power of the Big Five in the United States has been and is being unfairly and illegally used to manipulate live-stock markets; restrict interstate and international supplies of foods; control the prices of dressed meats and other foods; defraud both the producers of food and consumers; crush effective competition; secure special privileges from railroads, stockyard companies, and municipalities; and profiteer.

"The packers' profits in 1917 were more than four times as great as in the average year before the European war, although their sales in dollars and cents at even the inflated prices of last year had barely doubled. In the war years—1915, 1916, 1917—four of the five packers made net profits of $178,000,000."

EXTENT OF CONTROL.

On the extent of the Big Five ownership and control some of the points are as follows:

"In 1916 the Big Five's percentage of the interstate slaughter (animals whose products go into interstate commerce), including subsidiary and affiliated companies, was as follows: Cattle, 82.2; calves, 76.6; hogs, 61.2; sheep and lambs, 86.4. * * *."

"Swift & Co. is the greatest butter distributor in the United States, handling in 1916, in round figures, 50,000,000 pounds, or nearly as much as the combined sales of the two largest nonpacker organizations.

"Judged conservatively by trade estimates, the Big Five packers handle at least half of the interstate commerce in poultry and eggs and in cheese. * * *

"The Armour Grain Co. is a close corporation, in which J. Ogden Armour owns 64 per cent of the stock and other members of the family 22.9 per cent. * * * Its eight terminal elevators at Chicago and its two elevators at Kansas City constitute 25 per cent of the total elevator capacity of these cities. In 1917 it handled 75,000,000 bushels, or 23 per cent of all receipts, of grain at Chicago, the greatest market in the world. * * *

"Vegetable-oil products are becoming increasingly important as substitutes for animal fats. The most abundant and widely used of the vegetable oils in the United States is cottonseed oil, of which 31.8 per cent was refined by the five big packers in 1916. The most important by-product of the cottonseed-oil industry is cottonseed cake, which is in great demand by live-stock producers. * * *

"The packers, controlling the disposal of more than two-thirds of the offal produced in the packing industry, have become the most important factors in the manufacture of animal fertilizer ingredients and have strongly entered the field of production of mineral ingredients. In mixed fertilizers they produce 19 per cent of the total.

"Armour's drive into the rice market in a single year is perhaps the most striking instance of the potentialities in this direction (packer extension into staple groceries). Early in 1917 Armour & Co. first undertook the handling of rice and in that one year sold more than 16,000,000 pounds of rice, thus becoming at a single move, on the statement of the vice president of the company, 'the greatest rice market of the world.' * * *"

The summary also cites the facts regarding extent of packer control of leather and canned goods.

INSTRUMENTS OF CONTROL AND MONOPOLY.

On this subject the commission says:

"The Big Five have intrenched themselves in what may be called the strategic positions of control of food distribution. These * * * are stockyards, with their collateral institutions, such as terminal roads, cattle-loan banks, and market papers; private refrigerator-car lines for the transportation of all kinds of perishable foods; cold-storage plants * * *; branch-house system of wholesale distribution; banks and real estate. * * *

"* * * They are closely linked with a large number of banks, trust companies, and railroads, which connections are utilized, often unfairly if not illegally, for the promotion of the packers' interests in the food industry."

STOCKYARDS, CATTLE LOAN COMPANIES, AND LIVE-STOCK MARKET PAPERS.

Twenty-seven of the important stockyards are cited in which the packers own from 60 to 100 per cent of the capital shares. As to the cattle loan banks, it says:

"* * * How jealously this monopoly of making loans at the yards is guarded appears from the example at East St. Louis, where the packers would not permit the establishment of a rival bank within half a mile.

"Direct control by ownership of market papers and other trade periodicals was definitely established by the commission in the case of six papers, and there are a number of others controlled by various indirect but effective methods. Control of market papers is important, both for their actual and potential influence over shipments and prices by the character of statements published and put on the wires, as well as for protection against criticism. How important this may be is shown by a letter written by the editor of a Texas paper to Henry Veeder, referring to the marked change in the policy of his papers, as he expressed it, 'before and after taking' two loans of $5,000 each from Armour and Swift. * * *

"One of the trade journals frequently quoted as a source of authoritative information regarding the meat industry is the National Provisioner. An editor of this journal for years received a joint annual subsidy of $5,000 from Armour, Swift, and Morris.

"The big packers * * * are the largest, and in some cases practically the only, buyers at these various markets, and as such hold a whip hand over the commission men, who act as the intermediaries in the sale of live stock. * * *

"The Big Five own 93 per cent of the total of all kinds of cars owned by interstate slaughterers, including refrigerator, stock, tank, box, flat, and gondola cars. * * *

"The Big Five own 91 per cent of all refrigerator cars properly equipped for the shipment of fresh meat that are operated upon the railroads of the United States. The railroads have almost no equipment suitable for shipping dressed meat. * * * The smaller independents, therefore, confine themselves either to pork packing or to cattle slaughter for local consumption.

"Icing stations advantageously located on the lines of the trunk railroads between St. Louis, Chicago, and the Atlantic seaboard are owned and operated by three of the five packers. * * * Besides serving as a particular advantage to the owners in that their own ice service is secured at cost, these stations put them in a position to secure valuable information concerning the shipments and customers of competitors. * * *

"The big packers' cars have been carefully handled, promptly returned, and used only for the shipment of the packers' own commodities. The small packers, on the other hand, have been subject to extreme delays. * * *"

"* * * The railroads have also been accustomed to take liberties with the independents' cars, as, for example, permitting their beef cars to be used for the shipment of onions."

"The freight tonnage controlled by the big packers has for years given them a great leverage in all their dealings with the railroads. Until the Interstate Commerce Commission interfered this power was used to obtain money rebates and in recent years to secure special privileges and concessions * * *."

BRANCH HOUSES AND CAR ROUTES.

"The packers' distribution of their products is effected through a system of branch houses located in the large towns and cities and a system of refrigerator 'peddler car' routes which reach the smaller communities. * * * This system of wholesale distribution through branch houses and peddler cars is the bulwark of monopoly."

The number of branch houses of the Big Five is cited as 1,093; car routes, 1,297; towns covered by car routes and auto trucks, Armour 24,681, Swift 23,376.

EVIDENCE OF THE COMBINATION.

Among the evidences of combination the commission presents a chart of 108 companies in which the Big Five are jointly interested, nearly all of which they control.

Historically it cites the United States Senate committee's report in 1890, which found agreements between Armour, Swift, Morris, and Hammond to refrain from competition, with collusive prices and divided territory.

From 1893 to 1896 there was a pool of the same companies with the Cudahy Packing Co. and one other, meeting every Tuesday afternoon, Henry Veeder acting as secretary. This was testified by Veeder in 1912. Territory was divided, volume of business apportioned, penalties assessed for violation. From 1898 to 1902 there was a new pool, to which Schwarzchild & Sulsberger was an added party.

In 1902 the Department of Justice filed charges of conspiracy and restraint against the big packers, and in 1903 a permanent injunction was issued against them. Meantime the Big Five planned a $60,000,000 merger of their companies which fell through because of the panic of 1903, but a number of the independent plants they had secretly bought for it were turned over to the National Packing Co., a $15,000,000 corporation owned by Armour, Swift, and Morris. Veeder was secretary, and the directors met at the same hour on Tuesday afternoon as in the old pool. This effective plan continued till 1912, when, after failure of a criminal suit, threat of a civil suit caused dissolution of the National Packing Co., its plants being turned over to Armour, Swift, and Morris.

THE COMBINATION TO-DAY.

The old pool of meat shipments has now been replaced by a simpler, more effective "live-stock pool" or division of all live stock coming to market on agreed percentages, the cattle percentage being: Swift, 34 per cent; Armour, 27 per cent; Morris, 18; Wilson, 11; and Cudahy, 9. Since 1913 these percentages have held year by year, with scarcely 1 per cent variation. This agreement is an automatic regulator of the volume of packing-house products of the Big Five; it relieves them of any fear of competition, either in buying stock or selling meats. Each market has its own agreed percentages, but these are so adjusted as to give each packer his agreed share of the total of all markets.

Thus, even without any collusion beyond the agreement to divide purchases, the price to the producer "is bound in the long run to be the lowest price which will keep the producers raising cattle, hogs, and sheep and sending them to the stockyard."

A personal memorandum book kept by Germon F. Sulsberger of meetings of the combination is one source of evidence. These memoranda and other documents "form conclusive evidence of a criminal business conspiracy."

Sulsberger's memorandum of a meeting of White (vice president of Armour & Co.), Wilson, Edward Swift, and himself on June 4, 1914, at Armour's office, is clear evidence of an international pool with other Argentine companies for the shipment of meat from Argentina and Uruguay both to Europe and the United States.

JOINT FUNDS FOR INFLUENCING LEGISLATION AND PUBLIC OFFICIALS.

In the vault of Henry Veeder were found documents relating to joint funds maintained by the big packers and oleomargarine manufacturers:

"To employ lobbyists and pay their unaudited expenses; to influence legislative bodies; to elect candidates who would wink at violations of law and defeat those pledged to fair enforcement; to control tax officials and thereby evade just taxation; to secure modifications of governmental rules and regulations by devious and improper methods; to bias public opinion by the control of editorial policy through advertising, loans, and subsidies, and by the publication and distribution at large expense of false and misleading statements.

"Henry Veeder, the manager of the Veeder pools of the nineties, is the assessor, collector, and paymaster of these joint funds. * * *"

The purposes of the combination are named by the commission:

"To monopolize and divide among the several interests the distribution of the food supply not only of the United States, but of all countries which produce a food surplus, and as a result of this monopolistic position to extort excessive profits from the people not only of the United States, but of a large part of the world. * * *

"Among other well-known methods of unfair competition used by the big packers of which the commission has evidence may be mentioned the following: Bogus independents, local price discriminations, short weighting, acquiring stock in competing companies, shutting competitors out of live-stock markets.

VIOLENT PRICE FLUCTUATIONS IN LIVE-STOCK MARKETS.

"Our information shows that there are three principal causes for these violent price fluctuations:

"First. Collusive manipulation by the big packers to drive the prices either up or down, depending upon whether they are overstocked with fresh and cured meats and want to sell in a high market, or are understocked and want to buy in a low market.

"Second. Violent price fluctuations also occur as the result of disagreements among the Big Five. * * *

"Third. Unnatural price fluctuations are created when the packers controlling a particular live-stock market decide to keep some competitor out by raising prices. * * *"

ADVERTISING.

With reference to the Swift's widely published advertisements of $1.29 profit per head the commission quotes a letter of Charles H. Swift to Louis F. Swift and Edward F. Swift, which says:

"If ours and Libby's cattle were thrown together for the period, without including sausage or anything for good measure, it would bring ours up over $2 per head. (Libby, McNeill & Libby, canners, a subsidiary of Swift & Co.) * * *."

The commission further says:

"The packers, in their recent public statements and advertisements, have striven to create the impression that they have grown to their present size solely as a result of superior efficiency, and that whatever improper or illegal practices were discovered in connection with their business were merely incidental. The conclusion, however, that is produced by a study of their history and present activities is that they have attained their dominant position primarily as a result of unfair practices and illegal methods. * * *."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a report or review on the testimony of Sir Adam Beck, of the Province of Ontario, Canada, before our committee on the pending bill by Mr. John Roemer, for years chairman of the Railway Commission of the State of Wisconsin. He has made a study of water-power development not only of the United States but also of the various Provinces of Canada, and I think the review is very instructive——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CHICAGO, July 8, 1918.

Hon. JOHN J. ESCH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ESCH: For some time I have been interested in the development of water powers in this country. My interest has not been a financial one, as might be inferred from some of my activities. I am counsel for several public utilities in water-power States who at present have developments and might be affected by new legislation. This fact, however, does not in the slightest influence my judgment, as I do not represent or pretend to represent them in the matter of legislation.

While I was on the railroad commission of Wisconsin I was very much interested in the Canadian laws and the operations under them. Since then I have made considerable investigation, and have come to the conclusion that Americans would never submit to conditions prevailing in Canada.

I read with interest the remarks of Sir Adam Beck, delivered before your commission at Washington on the 15th of April last. In his statements I find some inaccuracies which I desire to bring to your attention. Also I think the impression he evidently sought to create, namely, that the hydroelectric system of Ontario is an ideal system and that the result of its work has been to create prosperity in Ontario, is not in accord with the facts.

In the first place the scheme may be briefly described as a scheme whereby the various municipalities involved give the commission a signed blank check, thereby enabling the commission to enter upon any expenditure it thinks wise and charge this expenditure on an alleged proportionate basis to the municipalities.

The last act or amendment to the Hydroelectric Commission act of 1918 even goes so far as to allow the commission, at the expense of the municipalities, to conduct experiments, buy and sell patents, and to manufacture electrical appliances or apparatus, the loss or profit on this new branch of the business to be charged up to the municipalities who have given the blank checks.

The municipality that goes into this scheme and is financially responsible, first, for 100 per cent of its local distribution system, and, second, for its proportion of the transmission plants cost, has absolutely no control or say as to how its money is to be expended; no control of its own distribution rates or anything else in connection with its expenditures.

The entire control of the expenditure of the enterprise is in the hands of the Hydroelectric Commission, which is conceded to be a one-man commission consisting of Sir Adam Beck, although nominally there are two other members.

Sir Adam, when before the committee, dwelt at some length on his statement that drastic as their powers under the various hydro commission acts appeared to be, nevertheless these powers had never been used in a drastic way and were just given them and added to year by year for the purpose of their moral effect on those who might be opposed to their wishes or methods.

This is partly true, and while the commission has acquired certain properties by negotiation, it is an exaggeration to call them "friendly negotiations" as does Sir Adam. The truth is that the same relation prevails between the victim companies absorbed and the Hydro Commission as exists between the unarmed innocent wayfarer and the hold-up man with a loaded revolver.

Sir Adam's methods, as I interpret them, in acquiring private properties or operating companies has been one of intimidation first and then ruthlessness.

He first emphasizes that he has the right to duplicate their systems and sell power at cost without including dividends or taxes, and with money borrowed at the lowest rate.

He intimates to his intended victims that he can seize their property and pay what he likes for it because no individual can bring him or his commission before the courts for review of his actions. He is a law unto himself.

He then intimates to the victim that if he desires to arbitrate as to the value of his property he may do so, but that he, Sir Adam, will select the single arbitrator who will fix the price, and that the sole qualification of this arbitrator need be that he is "skilled in the valuing of real property." (6 George V, ch. 19, sec.. 5.)

On the whole, the victim is persuaded it will be better for him to take any price that Sir Adam cares to offer rather than go through the farce of such an arbitration.

In speaking about some of the properties acquired by the Hydro, Sir Adam referred to the Trent Valley Canal Co. This was a company whose corporate name was the Electric Power Co. Its power was generated from the waste waters of the Trent Valley Canal, and its rights of generation were granted it by the Federal Government, and included several water falls that were held by the company for additional development when the power available from developed plants was disposed of.

Sir Adam brought into play all his methods of intimidation, but the company, relying on its Federal grants, refused to accept the low value put on its property by the Hydro engineers. Sir Adam then threatened suit by the Ontario government against the Federal Government to determine whether the Federal Government had the right to derive revenue from these water powers or whether they belonged to the Province. The revenues were small, and the Federal Government not wishing to stand suit agreed to cancel the development rights to all undeveloped concessions.

These undeveloped concessions were then placed at the disposal of the Hydro, and the Electric Power Co. was robbed of its reserve which it had held to meet its growing power market which it had created by years of pioneer work.

Sir Adam then renewed his "unfriendly negotiations" and threatened the company with competitive service from power generated from the company's former reserve.

The result was that the company sold its properties for about the amount of its bonded indebtedness, whereas its stockholders had built up a business of some potential value that they were unable to benefit from.

The rates for power in the communities served formerly by this particular company have not been reduced, and the municipalities have been unable to collect the taxes formerly received from the company.

In the case of the Ontario Power Co. the same general policy was followed. The company had an agreement with the Ontario government enabling it to generate as much power as it could obtain by the use of three pipe lines from a certain located intake to a certain located power house. The first pipe line constructed was of 18-foot diameter, and the plan indicated the location of two additional lines.

The Ontario government commission accepted the plan, and upon receiving notice from the company that it was about to proceed with the construction of a second pipe line issued orders that 18 feet was the maximum diameter it might be.

The Ontario Power Co. protested that its agreement did not limit the area but complied with the order.

It subsequently financed and commenced construction of its third pipe line, when without warrant or agreement and solely for the purpose of stealing the water from it for the use of the Hydroelectric Commission in its Chippewa project, the Ontario government commission refused it the right to proceed with the construction.

The company had already contracted to supply a large part of the power to be generated by the water through this third pipe line, and was purchasing power from another company during the construction period. As it was unable to renew the arrangement for this temporary purchase of power it was obliged to sell its magnificent property which it had promoted, financed, constructed, and operated up to a point where it was paying a dividend on its stock. The potential value of this stock consisted largely of the value to the company of the output of its third pipe line and represented a fair return after years of pioneer work in building up its business.

These are some of Sir Adam Beck's methods, which he calls "friendly negotiations."

In 1903 the Ontario government had granted charters and generating rights to three companies at Niagara Falls. Each of these agreements contained a clause providing that the government would not themselves make use of the waters of the Niagara or Welland River for the purpose of generating power. Without this protection the companies would have been unable to raise the large amount of capital they required.

Sir Adam Beck has now induced the government to rescind these charters as far as this clause is concerned, and after the capital has been obtained and tied up in plant has had an act passed saying that the government has changed its mind and is going to construct a plant of colossal size.

This act is entitled "An act respecting the public development of water power in the vicinity of Niagara Falls."

The act states that the government of Ontario has decided to go into the power generation business and after several clauses stating that it would build a plant to generate power from the waters of the Niagara or Welland Rivers, winds up with the following clause:

"7. The exercise of the powers which may be conferred by or under authority of this act, or any of them, shall not be deemed to be a making use of the waters of the Niagara River to generate electric or pneumatic power within the meaning of any stipulation or condition contained in any agreement entered into by the commissioners for the Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park."

This commission for the Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park is and was an honorary commission acting for the Ontario government, and its agreements with the three power companies which were violated by this act were all ratified by the government itself.

Sir Adam Beck referred several times during his remarks to the Toronto Power Co. and its subsidiaries, the Toronto Electric Light Co., the Toronto & Niagara Power Co., and the Electrical Development Co. of Ontario (Ltd.).

In connection with the Toronto Electric Light Co., he stated that the Hydro commission offered to purchase the stock of the company before duplicating its distribution system in Toronto.

This is a misstatement of the facts. No offer was ever made the shareholders. What happened was that the Hydro commission offered, if the light company would or could cancel its contract with the Toronto & Niagara Power Co. for the whole supply of Niagara power (which was known to be impracticable, as the power company had financed its whole undertaking on the strength of this and another contract for sale of power), then the Hydro would recommend that the city of Toronto would pay the company a sum of money for its plant that would enable it to pay its shareholders $125 per share for their holdings, which shares had sold a short time previously as high as $165 in the market.

When the light company had constructed its plant, it had an agreement with the city of Toronto which, while not explicitly giving it the exclusive right to the power and light market of the city, was secured by a general act covering the Province, which stated that in case a municipality had granted a franchise to a public utility company to operate in its borders, and in case the municipality desired to itself go into the business of the particular kind of utility business covered by the franchise, then the municipality had first to offer to purchase the assets of the existing company. Failing to reach an agreement, a board of three arbitrators was to be appointed, one of whom would be selected by the municipality, one by the company, and the third by certain judges of Ontario, which board should appraise the assets of the company.

If the company refused to accept the amount awarded by this board of arbitrators, then the municipality had power to duplicate its system.

This act was abrogated when the Hydro Commission was created, thus removing this valuable protection to the investments made during pioneer days by the company's shareholders and bondholders.

In connection with the Electrical Development Co. and the Toronto & Niagara Power Co., the only rivals of the hydroelectric system, with the exception of the Dominion Power & Transmission Co. of Hamilton, you will remember that Sir Adam Beck stated that it is the intention of the Government of Ontario to make a monopoly of the electric distribution in Ontario in favor of the hydro.

To eliminate its main competitor, namely, the Toronto & Niagara Power Co., the Hydro Commission opened "friendly negotiations." It asked what price the company would take for its properties. The company replied that it would sell it. generating company's plant (the Electrical Development Co., owning a generating plant at Niagara of 125,000 horsepower capacity), its transmission company (the Toronto & Niagara Power Co., owning transmission lines to Toronto, Welland, and Thorold, etc.), and its Toronto distribution company (the Toronto Electric Light Co., owning an extensive distribution system in the city of Toronto and suburbs).

The terms asked by the Toronto Power Co. were the repayment to it of the money invested in its properties. This offer was never considered, but immediately the ruthless destruction of the rights of these companies was commenced.

The vital part of this system is its distribution rights, as without its ability to transmit and distribute its product its generating properties would be reduced to a scrap basis.

The Hydro Commission, the city of Toronto, the Association of Hydro Municipalities, and the Ontario Government all combined to seek legislation from the Federal Government, from whom the distribution company obtained its rights, to seek the cancellation of these vested interests not only for the future but the legislation sought made the annulment retroactive for 12 years so as to cover all the plants constructed by the company.

The Senate of Canada threw out the clause sought by this powerful combination and reaffirmed the powers of the company, merely placing it under the regulatory control of the Dominion Railway Board, who were given authority to supervise any future construction of the company, with a view to public safety.

The House of Commons of Canada has not yet acted on the measure, which is now before them, and concerning which numerous deputations and lobbies have been sent to Ottawa to influence the members, the organs of the hydro in Ontario all the time threatening reprisals if the confiscatory measure is not put through.

I will not burden you with the details of the persecution of the Electrical Development Co., but suffice it to say that the Ontario government has been persuaded to enter action in the courts to attempt to restrict the company's operations in such a way as to make it unprofitable for it to continue in its undertaking. This suit seeks to confiscate part of the plant erected with the approval of the government commission.

The net result of the Hydroelectric Commission propaganda is to discourage absolutely the enterprise of capitalists in the development of water power and the distribution of electric power in Ontario. No water-power rights are obtainable and must remain idle until such time as the commission or Sir Adam Beck decides to develop them.

The creation of this condition has resulted in a large shortage of power required for the normal growth of the industrial life of the communities, and it is acknowledged even by the Hydro Commission that at present this shortage is over 100,000 horsepower in the Niagara district alone.

This result was primarily caused by the refusal of the Hydro Commission and the government to allow the Ontario Power Co. to install its third pipe line above referred to, which pipe line alone would have supplied power adequate for the present demands.

Sir Adam told you that Ontario is an industrial Province. He did not tell you that the average increase in demand for power is about 15 per cent per year, nor that during these war times this average is too low.

He did not tell you that the plants already built for the manufacture of munitions of war, many of which were constructed on the assurance of contracts for power with the Hydro Commission, have been unable to operate in whole or in part due to lack of power covered by their agreements.

He did not mention the millions of unproductive dollars invested in these manufacturing plants, unproductive because of failure on the part of the Hydro Commission to comply with the terms of their contracts, and that no redress was allowed these users because of the default of the Hydro Commission, as the commission is protected by law from suits for breach of contract unless they are a consenting party to such suits.

Somewhat categorically we take up Sir Adam's speech and find:

He states that in 1900 the leases of three companies at Niagara had been made as follows:

	Horsepower.
Canadian Niagara Power Co	100,000
Electrical Development Co	125,000
Ontario Power Co	180,000

The facts are that these agreements were for Canadian Niagara Power Co. not less than 110,000 horsepower with no limit, except that plans should be approved.

Electrical Development Co. for "125,000 horsepower for commercial use."

The Ontario Power Co. for all the water required by three pipe lines from a located intake to a located power house, with no limit in horsepower or size of pipe line.

The Electrical Development Co. agreement was dated January 29, 1903, not "1900."

Sir Adam Beck stated: "The Province of Ontario, we claim, is the manufacturing district for the whole of Canada."

The facts are that this was partly true until the advent of the Hydroelectric Power Commission, but since that date, say 1910, the manufacturing from the Montreal and Quebec districts has made enormous strides and challenges Ontario in her supremacy.

Recently the British-American Nickel Co., a corporation financed by the British Government, after an investigation of over a year, have decided to locate in the Province of Quebec largely because of their inability to make a fair arrangement with the Hydro Commission for power.

Sir Adam Beck states that the operating cost of hydraulic power is from 50 cents to $1 per horsepower.

The facts are that if we include taxes and Government rentals, insurance, wages, etc., the experience of the Niagara companies is that the cost, without including interest, is from $2 to $2.50 per horsepower of plant capacity.

Sir Adam states that the Ontario municipalities were given authority to generate power in 1902.

The facts are that this act referred to any group of municipalities and made no mention of Government guaranty of bonds or any breach of the Government's undertaking not to generate power at Niagara, which it had granted to the existing Niagara companies.

Sir Adam Beck states the Hydro Commission in calculating cost allowed 5 per cent for depreciation, whereas, as well as can be judged from the meager reports published, this depreciation is figured at about 3 per cent or less.

Sir Adam Beck states that his power of taking over existing properties is based on arbitration.

He neglected to state that the values are to be arrived at by a single arbitrator approved of by the Ontario government, whose sole qualification shall be a knowledge of real estate values.

Sir Adam stated that there is no profit to the State or to the municipality from the hydro operations.

He neglected to state the amount of taxes lost to the municipalities and the Province on the valuation given of $70,000,000 in hydro construction. Taxes on a low valuation represent a loss of over $1,400 000 per year to these municipalities without taking in war and income taxes and capital stock taxes.

Sir Adam states he has avoided duplication of plant.

His provincial commission has duplicated the high tension transmission lines Niagara to Toronto—80 miles—of the Toronto & Niagara Power Co. In Toronto, Hamilton, and London complete duplication of distribution systems was ordered by Sir Adam Beck's commission at a cost of about $13,000,000.

Sir Adam states he wants to create a real monopoly and states he set to work to acquire existing corporations and companies. He states that to establish hydro in a municipality it requires a vote of the people to a by-law.

Sir Adam Beck omitted to state how these by-laws were obtained.

In the case of the largest hydro municipal consumer (the city of Toronto) a plebiscite of the people was taken on the question, "Are you in favor of electric power at cost?" The result was a vote of 3 to 1 in favor of "power at cost." This plebiscite was then legalized by act of the legislature as a money by-law vote (for which the law states only property holders should vote), which enactment stated that this expression of opinion from every man entitled to vote for alderman, whether the voter owned property or not, was the same as if it had been properly voted on in the regular way, and the city officials were duly authorized to spend the necessary money for an $8,000,000 distribution system and to give Sir Adam's commission the city's credit, allowing him to draw on it in whatever figures he required for all time to come for transmission of power, generation works, experimental work, laboratory experiments, taking out or buying patents, manufacturing anything that is used electrically, whether apparatus or appliances, purchase of property of all kinds, and in fact everything the commission desires to use the money for time ad infinitum, without once asking the city for further approval.

Sir Adam Beck states his estimates of cost are always conservative.

The facts are his Chippewa development works were first estimated at $15,000,000, then, after the work was commenced, this was changed to $18,000,000, and later to $24,000,000.

Sir Adam Beck states that politics has not interfered with the Hydro Commission, but he does not say that the hydro has not interfered with politics.

The facts are that with the credit of 200 of the principal municipalities of Ontario in his hands to do what he likes with, the commission is stronger politically than any political party in the Province. Both political parties realize this and do not therefore dare to call their souls their own when the chairman of the Hydro asks for further arbitrary power. At the least show of resistance Sir Adam gives the S. O. S. signal, and deputations, sometimes 3,000 to 4,000 strong, invade the seat of government and demand that the Hydro's desires be satisfied. So far the pressure has been successful, even to the extent of making the Government repudiate its agreements granted on the honor of the Crown.

Sir Adam Beck stated:

"We can not expend money or undertake the construction of any works without an order in council from the Government.

"We could not expend any money, borrow money, issue any bonds without an order in council. The commission is entirely under the control of the Government."

The facts are that in law the above statements are correct, but in practice they are not, as the commission spends money regardless of any constraint and is not subject to provincial audit.

As an example of this might be cited the fact that in April, 1917, the Government appropriated $1,000,000 for the fiscal year for the Chippewa development. In nine months Sir Adam publicly declared he had spent $4,000,000. He stated publicly that he presumed the Government would produce the money, although it had not done so up to that time.

No proper audit of the hydro accounts has ever been published, and it has been a matter of public controversy. The Government of Ontario has been unable to secure a proper statement of the operations or expenditures. Such an audit has been ordered by the Parliament over 18 months ago, but has not been forthcoming.

The abnormally low rates charged by the Hydro Commission for power are not to be taken as an evidence of value.

The service rendered has been inferior, and on account of the long transmission and complicated operating conditions due to the large loads carried interruptions have been frequent and serious.

Eight and ten hour interruptions have been more or less frequent, and in view of the fact that the contracts of the commission are in no way binding on the commission it has frequently happened that power has been withdrawn entirely from a consumer, resulting in great loss.

The lost taxes, as stated above, would amount to at least $1,400,000 annually, and when Sir Adam Beck stated, as he did, that he was effecting an annual saving in rates to consumers of $2,380,000, he made no calculation of these taxes

He also neglected to say that this saving was based on a comparison with steam rates existing before the advent of hydraulic power. In Toronto the Toronto Electric Light Co. operated a steam plant, and in 1907 it purchased part of its power from the Toronto & Niagara Power Co. and was about to reduce its rates to a fair hydraulic basis, but the city made its so-called agreement to go into the Hydro ring of municipalities and compete with "power at cost"; the private company then decided to maintain its rates until compelled by competition to reduce them.

These steam rates are what Sir Adam uses in his comparison.

The Toronto Electric Light Co. had but 15,000 customers before the advent of the Hydro. It has now over 27,000 due to its superior services, and charges about 20 per cent higher rates than its competitor.

Sir Adam Beck's whole statement is bristling with inaccuracies and it is of little use to pursue them further.

The House Committee on Water Powers seemed anxious to find out the usual conditions of water-power grants in Canada, and Sir Adam was only able to speak of the Ontario agreements. These he quoted as being limited to a period of 40 years.

He was probably referring to concessions in connection with woodpulp grants.

The Niagara agreements were probably the last power-development agreements granted by the Ontario government before the Hydroelectric Commission came on the scene and put a stop to private enterprise in water-power development.

These Niagara agreements were for a term of 110 years, subject to a revision of rentals after the first 50-year period and every 30 years thereafter.

The rentals average $25,000 annually for the first 20,000 horsepower; $7,500 annually for from 20,000 to 30,000 horsepower; and 50 cents per horsepower per year above 30,000 horsepower.

So that a plant generating 100,000 horsepower would pay per annum:

First 20,000 horsepower	$25,000
20,000 to 30,000 horsepower	7,500
30,000 to 100,000 horsepower	35,000
100,000 horsepower for total of	67,500

or an average of 67½ cents per horsepower.

In closing I would submit that the Hydroelectric Commission of Ontario so far has not realized its object; that is, to produce ample power in Ontario and to make it available for all the people of Ontario.

It is true it has had a measure of success, but when all the facts of the case are considered it has fallen down badly. It undertook a large order, namely, to supply all the people in Ontario (for it is a provincial undertaking) with all the power they required. It acknowledges in this war crisis that it is over 100,000 horsepower short of what it could use without extending its present lines.

It has effectually put a stop to the investment of private funds in power or electrical development or traction development, especially interurban lines, and has undoubtedly caused an acute shortage in the output of munitions from Ontario plants by the prohibition it placed on the right of the Ontario Power Co. to construct its third pipe line at its Niagara plant in 1916, which it (the hydro) is now compelled to build in as a temporary measure and in a temporary way.

The Hydro is able, through its political influence referred to above, to expend from $2,000,000 to $4,000,000 annually on a new power development that Sir Adam estimates will produce power in 1922.

No other public work of size not connected with the war is allowed to proceed, as all available money is required for war purposes.

I have written at some length and am inclosing under separate cover several documents which will be of interest to you if you have time during your vacation to examine them.

Yours, very truly, JOHN H. ROEMER.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the proposed bill has been discussed in detail and at length. It is not my purpose to detain the committee. However, I desire to refer to one or two provisions in the bill.

According to estimates we have somewhere near 60,000,000 horsepower available for development under this bill. The proposition is to turn it all over to a commission composed of three secretaries—the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture—that commission to be given the power to dispose of it as in its wisdom it may seem wise through the issue of licenses running for 50 years, and so forth. The Federal Government is to be compensated to the extent of 10 or 15 cents per horsepower, or an amount sufficient to pay the administrative expenses, and the State service commissions are to fix the rate which the consumer shall pay. In this country we have State service commissions in a number of States fixing water-power rates. In Canada they have a municipal ownership operated under the Hydroelectric Power Commission of the Province of Ontario. In determining this all-inportant proposition it may be well to take into consideration the results of the experiment in Canada.

If so, a brief review of Sir Adam Beck's statement relating to Canada's experience may be of interest and value. In response to an invitation extended by the committee, Sir Adam Beck, chairman of the Hydroelectric Commission of Ontario, Canada, who has been identified with the Hydroelectric Power Commission since 1903, made a most interesting and instructive statement before the committee. According to Sir Adam Beck, Canada has given much consideration to water-power development as a public project or a provincial project. Its first attention was given to it in 1900 by the board of trade of the city of Toronto, which in 1900 did apply to the legislature for power to undertake the development and transmission of power from Niagara Falls. Up to that time leases of rights had been granted by the Province to the three companies, the Canadian Niagara Power Co., the Electric Development Co., and the Ontario Power Co., to generate 100,000 horsepower, 125,000 horsepower, and 185,000 horsepower, respectively, or a total of about 400,000 horsepower at Niagara Falls. The city of Toronto, which has a population of about 500,000 people, made application to the legislature for authority to generate power. Its application was rejected and a lease was granted to the Electric Development Co. Though disappointed, two years later a large convention was called of municipalities in the southwest part of the Province of Ontario; the Niagara district extended 250 miles west, 80 miles east, and 150 or 200 miles north. A commission was appointed to confer with the view of securing authority for the municipalities to undertake the development, distribution, and transmission of electricity as a municipal undertaking, also to generate power unless power could be procured on favorable terms from the three existing companies at Niagara Falls. An act was passed authorizing the municipalities to borrow money, to generate, transmit, and deliver power, and to appoint a commission of three to five members; a commission of four was appointed, and an expert electrical engineer, expert accountants, expert hydraulic and electric engineers were employed, and after 18 months a report was submitted, which Sir Adam Beck says was a revelation to the people as to what could be done and what a great benefit it would be to the communities where power could be had practically at cost. As to cost Sir Adam Beck expressed himself in this language:

> Now, when I speak of cost, I speak of it as covering all charges that are applicable to a business interest, charges, sinking fund, charges capable of discharging the whole indebtedness in 30 years; that is the whole of the investment made by the municipalities was to be retired by a charge included in the charge for power, the price of power delivered to the municipalities. Also a depreciation charge averaging 5 per cent, which was to provide for renewals or for the general depreciation of the system, the operating cost, the maintenance cost, and administration.

The question of whether the water-power and natural resources of the country should be developed for the good of the common people was made an issue. Though the proposition was characterized as radical, the party pledged to legislation making it possible for municipalities to undertake the development of power on their own account carried by a large majority and authority was granted to municipalities to acquire, by purchase or otherwise, and to hold shares in any incorporated company carrying on the business of developing, supplying, and transmitting electric power, to appropriate the lands, waters, water privileges or water power, powers or works, machinery and plants apportioned thereof of any person owning or operating under lease or otherwise, which in the opinion of the commission should be purchased, acquired, leased, taken, appropriated, and developed or used by the commission for the purpose of the act, all subject to arbitration. Though that drastic power was granted, up to the present time every property and right acquired, including 86 different plants, has been acquired by negotiations. The commission now operates 12 systems, which has contracts with 225 municipalities; of those, about 30 are townships. All the 12 systems are under one control, thus avoiding duplication of administration and operation, and thus getting the maximum of economy and efficiency. In Canada, as in every other country when new policies are suggested, opposition generally develops, and too often when in the interest of the people in general. Notwithstanding the vigorous opposition, the construction of 12 municipalities was approved in 1906 by an enormous majority, some ten to one. From then on all kinds of obstacles were thrown in the way.

As to the estimates, Sir Adam Beck stated:

> We were able, notwithstanding the provincial treasurer was somewhat convinced by the information that was placed on his table from those unfriendly to us, that our first undertaking would cost $12,000,000, we had estimated it would be under $4,000,000. We built it at the contract price, and we were several hundred thousand dollars below the estimates that we submitted to the municipalities. This created confidence in the minds of the people and also the municipal authorities.

The commission offered to buy the Toronto Electric Light Co.; it offered to assume all bonded debt of the company and to pay $135 for the common stock, which amounted to five or six million dollars. The company refused it and sold the plant to the McKenzie group, which controls the Niagara Power Co. Since then, of the 205 municipalities 56 privately owned distributing systems have been acquired. The Hydroelectric Power Commission has purchased 28 privately owned distributing and generating systems or stations. The commission began operation in the fall of 1910 by supplying 750 horsepower.

They pay primary interest charges, practically all 4 per cent, some from 5 to 6 per cent; sinking fund of 1.8 per cent, which retires the debt in 30 years; pay all the line losses, depreciation charges, operation, administration, and so forth.

The commission up to date has invested $53,000,000 in transmission, distribution, and generating system. The municipalities have invested $17,000,000, which makes a total investment of $70,000,000. The commission anticipates that by 1921 more than $100,000,000 will be invested in a hydroelectric power system in the Province of Ontario. Three hundred and ten thousand horsepower is being distributed and 750,000 horsepower will be available for the use of the people in the Province. As to the rate charged, Sir Adam Beck, chairman of the Hydroelectric Commission of Ontario, had this to say. I refer you to page 714, hearings, April 15, Part III:

> The average price of power or cost of power delivered to 225 municipalities in the Province of Ontario is under $18 a horsepower. We have made reductions annually. We were obliged to make reductions because the excess surplus earnings of the municipalities were such that if we had continued the rates that were originally established, based on one-half the cost that they were buying or securing power for previous to our coming into the field, we would have had such a large surplus that the whole debt of the municipality would have been wiped out in 10 or 15 years.

On page 716, Sir Adam Beck had this to say:

> We transmit power, as I said, over these various districts as far as 250 miles, we have between five and six thousand miles of double transmission lines. We have competition in the cities of Hamilton, Toronto, Ottawa, and Windsor, where the Edison Co., of Detroit, are doing business. I may say that we have bought out the Edison Co. in the Essex district, opposite Detroit. Our total market there at the present time is only five or six thousand horsepower. We are able to sell power to the citizens of Windsor, which has only 25,000 population, immediately opposite Detroit, where they have over half a million population, at 40 per cent lower rates than they are receiving in the city of Detroit. And we are meeting all our obligations. In Toronto we are selling power at one-half the rates you have in the city of Buffalo, 20 miles from the Falls; Toronto is 84 miles from the Falls.
> We have small towns, such as Galt, 89 miles, St. Thomas, 120 miles, from Niagara Falls, where the rates are just one-half the rates that the company in Buffalo is charging for its light and power.
> Buffalo prices were fixed by your public-service commission, and I think they were reduced by 20 or 25 per cent a year or so ago, but they are still twice as high as the average price we are supplying 200 municipalities. I am not saying this with any reflection on anybody. Their capital investment may be enormously larger and interest charges may be higher, and the stock, of course, has to be taken care of.
> The CHAIRMAN. We want the facts whether they reflect on anyone or not.

Sir ADAM BECK. They are facts: we have a pretty big organization watching us, not only in Canada but in the United States. And perhaps some of you had a copy of that issue, "An expensive experiment," that was liberally distributed by the thousand in Canada and the United States.

We are going on increasing our developments, and by 1921 we will have increased our plants to, I hope, 750,000 horsepower; we began with 750 horsepower seven years ago.

On page 711 Sir Adam Beck had this to say of the Ontario Power Co., which was acquired last August:

Negotiations were entered into, and the Hydroelectric Power Commission acquired the plant and took possession after about a year's negotiation. This is the company that has a contract with the commission for 100,000 horsepower.

The remaining 60,000 is under contract to the Niagara-Lockport Co. We assumed the whole of the bonded indebtedness of the company, amounting to about $15,000,000. We acquired the common stock of the company and paid them $8,000,000 in 40-year Hydroelectric Power Commission 4 per cent bonds, guaranteed by the Province of Ontario, a transformer station, and a short system of lines in the immediate vicinity of the plant itself; we reduced the cost of operation by over $40,000 a year; we have two firm contracts, one with the municipalities and one with the Niagara-Lockport Co., expiring in 1950; our revenue will be sufficient to maintain the plant to the highest point of efficiency, provide for renewals and depreciation charges and operation; we will have sufficient revenue to retire the whole of the debt in 25 years—that is, instead of the Ontario Power Co. owning this plant, we will, in 25 years, out of the reserves that we are setting aside, pay off the whole of our indebtedness and own the plant, free of debt, in 25 years from last August.

The CHAIRMAN. Without increasing the cost to the consumer?

Sir ADAM BECK. Yes.

Speaking of the benefits accrued, Sir Adam Beck had this to say:

You may like to know what benefit has accrued to the country on account of all this expenditure. We have reduced by five or six million tons per annum the consumption of bituminous coal in the Province of Ontario. We have reduced the freight haul on all this coal (the use of cars to haul the coal), and the obnoxious smoke that is created by the use of coal for manufacturing purposes in towns and villages. Electric power has been made available to every community, small or large, from a township to the largest city prepared to make a contract with the commission and assume the liability that accrues on account of such an undertaking. There is no discrimination. The small user buys electricity at the same price as the large user. There is a standard rate in every community, which applies whether you use 10 horsepower or 10,000 horsepower. In the case of domestic users, the small consumer buys it for less than the large user. There is no such thing as a flat rate to any consumer. When we took over these companies, we found that there were some individuals in a community that got a very much lower rate for power than others. We found that the large user got power at a low price and the small user had to pay four or more times as much as the large user paid. We wanted to encourage the wagon maker, the blacksmith, the industry that might use a small amount of power, so we fixed an equitable, fair, and just rate for all users. In case of the domestic users we make a service charge. A house with 1,000 square feet floor space pays 30 cents per month for service, whether they use light and power or not. A larger house with 3,000 square feet pays 90 cents. The small householder with 1,000 square feet had all the privileges and right to use electricity for 30 cents a month for which the larger house paid 90 cents. He had the further privilege that when he exceeded 30 kilowatt hours his rate is 1 cent, as in the case of the city of London, 125 miles from Niagara Falls. We pay 2 cents for the first 30 kilowatt hours used for domestic purposes. In excess of that it is 1 cent per kilowatt hour up to 60, and then we pay half a cent a kilowatt hour for cooking, the heating of water, fans, vacuum cleaners, irons, and so on. At any rate, the small householder, a working man, who lives in a small house, secures electricity at the same rate that I do, his service charge is lower, and he secures a reduction in the rate before I do, as I must use 90 kilowatts before I get a 1-cent-a-kilowatt-hour rate, and I must use 180 kilowatt hours before I receive a half-cent rate per kilowatt hour.

The saving to the users of electricity—that is, the rates in existence in 1912 and the rates in existence in 1916—for household purposes alone was $2,380,000 per annum. That is the saving to the householders in the various municipalities. The total accumulated surplus to the credit of the municipalities and the commission in 1917 is over $6,000,000. The surplus is all reinvested in the plants—none of the money can be taken out of the various systems. Take the city of London last year: After paying interest and sinking fund and maintaining the plant, keeping it all in first-class operating condition, up to original standard, had a surplus on an investment of $750,000 of $76,000 applicable to depreciation or renewal account. The plant value, because of the reserves being reinvested in extensions and improvements in the plant, is $1,200,000.

So you see they have the earning power of a million and a quarter—they have practically half a million dollars invested in the plant on which they do not pay any interest charges, only maintenance, operation, and depreciation charges. The sinking fund pays the bonds that are issued in 30 years, so that the plant in 30 years will be free of debt in the city of London. A corporation or company would naturally have issued three quarters of a million of common stock, and that common stock, if the surplus had been used to pay dividends, would have paid 10 per cent on the common stock, on an equal amount of stock as the bonded debt amounted to. Money so invested in the plants amounts to $2,000,000. The sinking fund and depreciation reserve amounts to $4,500,000 in six years. Some of the municipalities, of course, have only been in operation a year or two. The net surplus is $1,500,000. That is after writing off 5 per cent for depreciation. The commission's reserve and surplus is $1,600,000. The total reserve surplus of the municipalities and the commission is $7,670,000 on a total investment of some $70,000,000.

As to the cost, on page 703, Sir Adam has this to say:

The operating cost is from 50 cents to $1 per horsepower, while the fixed charge on the capital invested, interest, sinking fund, and renewal fund or depreciation is from six to eight dollars per horsepower, so you see how small an amount of the cost of power constitutes labor or operating power.

As to cost, Sir Adam Beck says:

Now, when I speak of cost I speak of it as covering all charges that are applicable to a business—interest charges, sinking-fund charges, capable of discharging the whole of the indebtedness in 30 years. That is, the whole of the investment made by the municipalities was to be retired by a charge included in the charge for power—the price of power delivered to the municipalities. Also a depreciation charge averaging 5 per cent, which was to provide for renewals or for the general depreciation of the system, the operating costs, the maintenance cost, and administration.

In hydroelectric development the operating cost is from 50 cents to $1 per horsepower, while the fixed charges on the capital invested, interest, sinking fund, and renewal funds, or depreciation is from $6 to $8 per horsepower. So you see how small an amount of the cost of power constitutes labor or operating cost.

Gentlemen, I suggest before passing this bill a careful reading and consideration of Sir Adam Beck's statement to the committee. If you do, I believe that but one conclusion can be reached, and that is that under this bill we are turning over to a number of bonding companies and exploiters resources which in the light of experience and according to rates fixed in the past by State service commissions, who are to continue the fixing of rates, will net the exploiters at least $1,000,000,000 a year in excess of a reasenable return upon their investments and the return of their capital several times over during the term of the license to be granted.

According to Sir Adam Beck's statement, under municipal ownership and under proper regulations and profits the consumer would pay from $9 to $18 per horsepower. Not only would the consumer have had the use of the power at one-half the cost likely under this bill, but every dollar invested, together with liberal profits and interest on the investment, would be returned to the investor. Under the proposed plan, if the State service commission continues as it has in the past, it will permit excessive charges and exorbitant profits, the consumer will pay twice the rate per horsepower, the promoter, the investor, the licensee will collect twice the rate sufficient to pay a liberal profit and a reasonable rate of interest on his investment of every nature, including operating expenses, and an amount equal to his investment every few years; besides, if 60,000,000 horsepower is developed an annual rake-off of at least a billion dollars, and when I say a billion dollars that, of course, is a most conservative estimate—an excess charge of $17 per horsepower on 60,000,000 horsepower would make up the billion. The chairman called attention to consumers paying $110 per horsepower, which is probably close to $100 in excess of a reasonable cost. At any rate, it is safe to say that if rates are to be fixed by commissions, as proposed, the annual excess cost to the consumer and the excess profit to the licensee would be at least a billion dollars a year. At the rate we are spending money a billion dollars a year, more or less, may not be of much consequence, but there may be a time coming when a billion-dollar income or saving annually may come in handy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has just referred to the comparative prices charged for electric power in Detroit, on the American side, and Windsor, on the Canadian side, and at Buffalo, on the American side, and 200 municipalities in Canada. Will the gentleman advise the committee whether the power that is charged for on the American side, in Buffalo and in Detroit, is hydroelectric power or whether it is generated from steam?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is hydroelectric power.

Mr. FERRIS. All generated at the same place.

Mr. HAUGEN. All generated at the same place and from the same source.

Mr. STAFFORD. As far as Detroit is concerned, I think the gentleman is in error, because there, I know, the Edison Co. manufactures its power, which supplies, largely, Detroit, from steam.

Mr. HAUGEN. I am quoting Sir Adam Beck, who is the chairman of the Hydroelectric Power Commission of the Province of Ontario, and who, I believe, knows more about hydroelectric power and the operation of it than any other man living.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is entirely right as to Buffalo.

Mr. STAFFORD. My question was not only as to Buffalo, of which condition I am not acquainted, but as to Detroit, of which I have some acquaintance.

Mr. FERRIS. I answered as to Buffalo, because I was up there with an inspection committee a couple of years ago.

Mr. DOREMUS. If the gentleman will pardon me, according to the testimony of Sir Adam Beck, in many municipalities of Canada domestic consumers of light are getting it from the various cities at from 2 to 3 cents per kilowatt hour.

Mr. SIMS. The average is one and a quarter cents to domestic consumers throughout all of Canada.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am aware of this fact, which may be disclosed by the hearings, that the power generated by the hydroelectic power of Canada, where the charges are under the supervision of Sir Adam Beck, has been more than utilized, so that manufacturing plants in Ontario and otherwheres in Canada to-day can not acquire any additional power for manufacturing purposes. The Hydroelectric Co. there, however, is preparing to install additional machinery at Niagara Falls so as to accommodate the growing demand for power in lower Ontario.

Mr. DOREMUS. And it may be also interesting to know that this very nominal charge is sufficient to amortize the debt at the end of 30 years.

Mr. HAUGEN. Sir Adam Beck's statement was this: That the operating cost was from 50 cents to $1 per horsepower and the fixed charge on the capital invested, sinking fund, interest, and renewal or depreciation is from $6 to $8 a horsepower. The average charge in Canada in 200 municipalities is less than $18 per horsepower. The charge on our side is twice that charged in Canada. I suggest a careful reading of Sir Adam Beck's statement. If you will give it a careful study you will find that there is only one conclusion to be reached, and that is that we are turning over Uncle Sam's most valuable resources without compensation; and the result will be this: That the consumer will pay twice the price he would pay under the Canadian policy. Under it or under proper legislation the consumer will have the use of the power at half the price.

The money will be returned to the Government or the investor with a liberal profit, with a reasonable rate of interest, and the property will belong to the Government or the municipality after a certain number of years. On the other hand, if this bill is passed and if the State service commissions continue as they have in the past, the consumer will pay twice as much and the investor will have his investment returned to him every few years besides. He will be able to reap a profit of at least a billion dollars a year, while all the Government will receive will be the administrative expenses.

This, I believe, is sufficient to prove that rates to be fixed by the commission and the State service commission will be largely in excess of cost and liberal profits to the developer. There is no way of estimating the amount, but judging from what is being done it is safe to say from $9 to $50 per horsepower. Some have estimated it at $33 to $42 per horsepower. For the sake of argument, we will say half of that amount; if so, and if 60,000,000 horsepower is developed, they have an annual rake-off of over $2,000,000,000 a year.

With the experience we have had in Government ownership and operation regulations, with the increased cost in transportation under Government control, which resulted in an additional $900,000,000 burden pinned onto the American people annually, the expense of postal systems, the high cost of Government printing—in fact, the high cost of everything which the Government undertakes—one naturally hesitates in even referring to, much less suggesting, Government ownership or operation. Be that as it may, the fact that Government ownership or operation has proven a failure in our country and the fact that it most likely will prove a failure, the mixing of politics and business generally spells ruin, and as politics is bound to mix with Government business there seems to be no prospect for a successful Government ownership and operation here; but that is no reason for giving away our most valuable resources, in many instances to be exploited by greedy financiers, or the so-called high financiers, at the expense of the American people. But the contention is that unless we pass this bill there will be no hydroelectric-power development.

If one is to give it all away and if, as stated by the chairman, that the high rate charged by steam generating and other plants will necessarily have to be the rate charged for hydroelectric power then there is nothing to be gained by the consumer, the Government, or anybody except the licensee. Another contention is that the Government has no property rights. If the Government has no property rights, or no right to charge for the power, it has no right to charge as provided in section 10, page 37, subdivision D, which provides as follows:

> The licensees shall pay to the United States a reasonable annual charge in an amount to be fixed by the commission.

Nor has it a right to charge as was suggested in the administration bill, the minimum charge of 10 cents per horsepower, which amount, I take it, reflects on the judgment of the three Secretaries who prepared the bill and who are to be given power to fix rates, a rate which in all probability will be the rate fixed by the commission. That rate is, of course, absurd, and instead of providing for any such absurd rate, the committee, to avoid it appearing ridiculous in the matter, struck out the 10 cents and reported the bill in its present form. I take it that all will agree that rather than make a charge of 10 cents for a concession worth from $10 to $50, the Government had better give it all. If the policy adopted by Canada or that by Government ownership or operation is not adopted, we should provide in this bill first for reasonable charges to be paid by the consumer—a charge that would insure a liberal profit to the investor and to amortize the project in 20 to 50 years, and that when every dollar expended, together with a liberal return of the investment, has been earned or paid to the licensee, the licensee shall then turn the property over to the Government. The Government can then operate it, lease it, or turn it over to the municipalities. If the Government needs the revenue it can make a reasonable charge; if not, its use can be turned over for the benefit of the people in general. If so, subdivision D, section 10, page 36, should be amended. The amortization reserve referred to should be made compulsory. There should be no ifs and ands about it. We should provide for recapture for amortization reserve pure and simple, and when once the improvement of the plant has been amortized or paid for it should be returned to the Government, its owner. The bill and the license should provide for a fixed annual charge for the use of the water power sufficient to pay all Government expenses and to amortize the project in an estimated period of years.

The annual rent should either be credited to the Government or be applied as part payment for the improvements or the investment made by the licensee, or be paid into the Treasury and set aside for the purchase of the licensee's property at the expiration of the license, and when the amounts paid equal every dollar invested, including interest and a liberal profit on the investment, or, in other words, when every legitimate and proper claim has been fully paid, the licensee should return to the Government its property, the water power and improvements paid for as earned by the use of the Government property, and release all his claims, the same as in the case of a farmer borrowing money from the Federal loan bank, who gives his mortgage and pledges his farm as security for the loan. He pays interest and part of the principal annually, or he pays it all at maturity, and when his debt is fully paid the mortgage is canceled, and his farm is returned to him free of incumbrance. So in this instance the licensee pledges his improvements or investment as security for the use of the water power and Government property, and when his indebtedness to the Government for rent is equivalent to his claim his claim is exhausted, and the property should be turned over to the Government; if not, he should be made to do so.

Under such an agreement the bondholders and investors, for whom there is so much anxiety, need have no fear of losing a dollar so far as the Government is concerned. They will have in their possession not only their own property as security but the Government property as well, until they are fully reimbursed, and nobody can dispossess them of the premises until every claim which they may have has been fully satisfied. Certainly, when every claim has been fully satisfied they should be willing to give up the property, same as the mortgagee who releases his claim after the mortgage has been fully paid and satisfied; if not willing, they should be made to give it up. In that respect the recapture and amortization provision should be written so plainly that he who runs may read. Our experience in that respect has been most deplorable; only a few years ago we paid railroad companies millions to vacate Government property here in the District, to which the railroads had no legal or moral claim. Another striking example is that of the Government leasing the land on which the property of the Washington Market Co. is located. According to the committee's report (No. 558, 65th Cong., May 1, 1918) accompanying H. R. 10893, a bill to repeal an annual 99-year lease granted and made to the company by act of Congress. According to the report the title to the land upon which the market building stands has been in the United States since the location of the Federal city in 1802.

Prior to the granting of the lease the site was occupied by the municipal market building under the control of the city government. Stalls were leased. The receipts, after paying expenses for some years previous to May 20, 1870, the net earnings of the Municipal Market Co. amounted to about $14,000 annually. The annual rental fixed in the lease was $25,000, which was in 1873, three years later, reduced to $7,500 a year by the Legislative Assembly of the District. The committee's report calls attention to a funded debt of approximately $22,000,000 which was imposed upon the District of Columbia, a very large part of which was incurred for improvements which became valueless in a few years, such as defective street improvements. On page 3 of the report it is stated that the District of Columbia and the United States have contributed approximately $25,000,000 to pay debts and interest, for which the District of Columbia received little benefit and the United States none whatever. For more than 20 years the United States and District of Columbia hired as an armory portions of the second and third floors of the building of the Washington Market Co. at a rental of $8,000—$500 a year more than the entire ground rent paid by the company—and is now paying $14,000 a year for a portion of the second floor of the building, or $7,000 a year more than the entire ground rent. The charter provides that after a lapse of 30 years from 1870 the lease may be canceled by paying the market company the value of the building on the site. The rent paid by the company is estimated to be only six-tenths of 1 per cent of the value of the land. The Government is now paying exorbitant rents, in some instances from one to three dollars per square foot, for office space. New buildings covering blocks have been erected; many more are needed. Numerous efforts have been made to terminate the lease and to appropriate it for Government use. Notwithstanding that, there seems to be no prospect of Congress asserting its rights in that direction. Numerous other instances might be referred to.

When we consider the number of deals put over, one wonders how it happens that these valuable resources were not discovered and appropriated before. Think of it. A billion or two annual excess profit dangling in the air all these years unappropriated. Several attempts have been made to have them appropriated, but so far without success. Why turn it all over now, I know not, except upon the claim as a war proposition, which, of course, falls to the ground when confronted with the fact that neither money, material, nor labor can be had to develop hydroelectric power. Even if money, material, or labor can be had. the cost would be so enormous that no prudent concern would undertake it at this time.

Only a few years ago several enterprising gentlemen undertook to gobble up a few sections of Government coal lands. That scheme was, of course, only a drop in the bucket as compared with this. An investigation was ordered, and, fortunate for the country, the Government is still hanging onto some of its coal lands. If we shall in one little bill, in one stroke, part with all these valuable resources without compensation, without so much as "thank you," if so important and wise, to accommodate these enterprising people, who, with their attorneys, have been knocking at the doors of Congress all these years, why not include the coal, minerals, and forests, and the job will be complete. Uncle Sam's resources will then be exhausted and future Congresses will not need to be concerned about conserving his resources; it can then devote all its time to taxation and providing soft berths in the public crib for worthy and deserving applicants. In my opinion, that is not the wise course to pursue. When this war is over we shall have interest to pay, probably many billion dollars—no one knows—taxation and bond issues also have a limit, and it may be that a billion or two of revenue from this source annually might be desired. Many seem to think that this war is going to be expensive; all agree that if it runs along a year or more we shall appropriate at least fifty or a hundred billion dollars. This bill, these resources, can be made to pay every cent of it. Before parting with it would it not be well to ascertain our national future need and to bear in mind that a billion or two is not so easily picked up annually. In amount it is equivalent to the cost of all the wheat made into flour and sold for consumption in the United States this year at the price of $2.40 per bushel, the price finally fixed in the Agricultural bill, and over which there has been so much contention. One billion dollars a year for 50 years is approximately four times the estimated value of all the land in the United States in the year 1900 and two and one-half times the value of all farm property in the same year; almost ten times the individual deposits in 1,606 loan and trust companies in 1916; twelve times the individual deposits in 15,450 State banks; five times the individual deposits in 7,589 national banks; and approximately two and a half times the total individual deposits in all our National, State, private, savings banks, and loan and trust companies for 1916. Fifty billion dollars is one and a half times the total production of gold and silver in the world since the discovery of America, and more than eleven times the total money in the Treasury and in circulation in the United States in 1916. Gentlemen, to me it seems that a concession running for 50 years, valued at more than a billion dollars a year, should not be granted, especially at this time, without compensation, except to pay administrative expenses.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up any more time at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall use all the time, and I would like at this time to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the water-power bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, we are all interested in water-power legislation. The country is interested in it. And brushing aside a lot of camouflage and a lot of considerations that are important and yet are minor in character, the essential thing that demands our thought is to so frame the bill under consideration that private or corporate interests may not tie up perpetually the water power of the country and make for their own benefit a gigantic monopoly to which the people will pay tribute.

Private interests have tried for years to induce Congress to pass a law under which perpetual grants could be made by the Government, or to have the Government remove all strictures so that they could apply to the States for perpetual grants. The Congress has steadfastly refused to meet the terms demanded. Failing in their demands, corporate interests have tried to obtain the most favorable terms possible for themselves and the most difficult possible for water-power development by States and municipalities. They have urged for themselves long leases; they have urged in the name of legislation that would not "frighten capital" such conditions as would make difficult or impossible bars for municipalities to meet; they have not failed to notice a very general demand for municipal development, and they have stood for legislation touching the recovery or recapture of a power project that private capital might develop that would be so extreme as to make the recapture quite out of the question. In a multitude of other ways those who have stood for private development of the electric energy in our country by means of water power have tried to impose impossible conditions that would discourage the taking over of projects already developed.

Now, I am not blind to the fact that in many sections of our country the sentiment is pronounced in favor of development of water power by private interests, the sections apparently feeling that through Federal or State control the people will be abundantly protected. However, for my part I am not so sanguine, and I shall indicate in my remarks the reasons why I am not.

I personally believe that municipal development of water-power systems of our country will mean for the greatest interest of our people, and I want to see the bill we are considering so shaped that if there must be private development of water power in some places, there may also be ample opportunity for municipal development of hydroelectric energy wherever the people may be willing to assume that responsibility, just as they have already assumed the responsibility of maintaining their schools, building their roads, and engaging in many other activities that are commonly felt can be better managed by the people acting as a group rather than by private interests. I was one of the Members of Congress four years ago who opposed the Shields water-power bill. I am opposed to the water-power bill that has come over to the House from the Senate, and I congratulate the special committee of the House on framing a substitute bill that is incomparably better than the proposition that was handed to them when they began their deliberations upon the question.

I am going to propose a series of amendments, however, to the House bill, looking to the end that still greater opportunity may be given for municipal development of hydroelectric energy; and while my remarks now will in part pertain to the amendments that I shall propose, I shall discuss them more fully under the five-minute rule, and shall now call attention to a few outstanding matters connected with this whole problem.

OUTSTANDING REASONS WHY SOMETHING MUST BE DONE.

Few bills, aside from those immediately pertaining to the war, have been before the Congress in recent years that were of such tremendous interest to the people of our country and the people who will make up the citizenship of this country in the years to come as the water-power measure that we are now considering. This question is of tremendous importance for several reasons.

In the first place, it is of tremendous importance because there is a constantly increasing demand for power in industry, for heat to be generated by some means, for light to be used in business and in private homes, and for the multitude of uses that hardly can be classified as industrial and yet are of vital importance to the individual families throughout the land.

The fuel supply of the world must necessarily grow smaller day by day. Our coal can not last forever. We are already talking of the time when the coal supply of the world will be eliminated. Our oil and gas supplies can not last forever. We are using them to-day in prodigal manner, and yet we have been told that we have reached the apex, or well-nigh the apex, of oil and gas production in our country, and it will not be long before the annual supply of coal and oil and gas will probably be considerably less than in years preceding.

In a well-written article in the Railway Review for August our attention is again called to the increase in price of coal, and the authority points out that while the immediate cause for this increase in price is due to the war the diminution of labor both in the mines and in connection with transportation agencies and the necessity for transportation agencies to be used in large extent for other things besides coal, there must be a swinging back of the price of coal when the war shall be over, and yet, he says, that in all likelihood the price of coal will never approach to within about 30 or 40 per cent of the prices that prevailed before we engaged in the war.

Not long ago the fuel question was in large part met by the timber supply of our country. More and more this supply is being exhausted until to-day in all of our larger cities wood does not enter largely as a fuel factor.

The available water power in the United States is estimated at more than 60,000,000 horsepower by the Geological Survey without resorting to storage facilities. However, by resorting to storage facilities there appears to be practically a maximum storage of close to 200,000,000 horsepower. At present some six or seven million horsepower has been developed.

Herbert Knox Smith, in his report upon the water-power development of the United States a few years ago, indicated that for every horsepower developed hydroelectrically there was a saving of 5½ tons of coal. Upon the basis then of more than 6,000,000 horsepower used in the United States there is a saving of 35,000,000 tons of coal every year.

You can figure for yourself the millions of dollars that would be saved by translating the tons of coal into its selling price.

Consider then the development of 60,000,000 horsepower hydroelectrically and you have a net saving of 330,000,000 tons of coal annually, which at the present prices would aggregate more than the entire cost, in normal conditions, of administering the affairs of our country.

In an article by E. A. Palmer in a recent Railway Review he points out in graphic manner tendencies in electrification of the railway system of the United States. He says there are 260,000 miles of railroads in our country and that on this entire distance more than 66,000 steam locomotives are hauling the products and passengers from place to place.

He points out that operation by electric motive power has hardly scratched the surface of possibilities of electric use in the railway world.

Mr. Palmer says that the horsepower that may be utilized on electrified railroads is almost without limit. He points out the conspicuous example of the electrification of the Elkhorn grade of the Norfolk & Western Railway. He points out that in 1906 the traffic amounted to 280,000,000 ton-miles, while 10 years later, or the first year after electrification, in 1916, the traffic amounted to 593,000,000 ton-miles, or an increase of 110 per cent, resulting in only 10 per cent increase in transportation expenses.

He points out that on the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad 100 electric locomotives are handling passenger, freight, and yard business on approximately 600 miles of tracks, which includes some of the busiest four-track railroads in the world.

The Pennsylvania Railroad during the last 18 years has been extending electrification of its lines. The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad is now handling by electric locomotives the 440 miles on the Rocky Mountain & Missoula division and is electrifying the 211 miles embraced within the Cascade division. The power generated on the Rocky Mountain & Missoula division is from water, and annually the utilization of water power for the motive energy of this division alone of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul upon present tonnage will save not less than 200,000 tons of coal and 425,000 barrels of fuel oil. Mr. Palmer translates this tremendous saving of energy in this language:

> Expressed in popular terms, the Rocky Mountain division will save sufficient fuel this year to supply 90 transports of 13,000 tons displacement bearing troops and munitions from the United States to France and return.

What then shall we say of the saving in fuel of all kinds in the electrification of many thousands of miles of railways within our country? What shall we say of the application of hydroelectric power in running our factories, in lighting our cities, in the operation of the machinery of our mines? And we must remember that in large part even the electric power that is now being utilized for all these purposes is being generated by steam that is produced by coal or fuel oil.

The development then of hydroelectric energy means the conservation of fuel of all kinds. It means thereby the extension of use of fuel into the indefinite future, and it means the opportunity to use fuel in the places where it can be used to better advantage than can electric energy.

In connection with this thought it must be borne in mind that in the utilization of water powers of our country in the development of hydroelectric energy we are not exhausting or diminishing the source of supply. The common sources of energy that I have indicated—timber, coal, fuel oils, and gas—are exhausted by use; not so with hydroelectric energy. Here is a power that is developed from the water of our streams which if not used flows on to the ocean, having contributed nothing of energy that is potentially within it.

In 100 years from now, though using hydroelectric power all that time, and using all we will be able to develop, there will exist the same capacity for producing hydroelectric energy that exists to-day. In fact, in all probability the natural opportunities for the development of hydroelectric energy in 100 years from now will be greater than they are to-day, for the reason that with the extension of agriculture, with the cultivation of our lands, with the widening of zones in semiarid regions that are productive under irrigation and the growing of forage, of timber, of other kinds of plant life, we create the very conditions that retard and hold back the flow of streams and, in fact, in some places increase the potentiality to such an extent that we may say that in all probability in the very use and development of the water power of our country it will be another case where "giving is a gaining," and the children of other years will have even more, notwithstanding our greatest use, than if we had not used at all.

Now, if it is important to consider the development of the hydroelectric energy in our country, there are several questions that are vital in connection with the same. A very cursory examination of the matter reveals the fact that, for the most part, the hydroelectric power that is used in our country to-day is concentrated within and under the control of a very limited number of large concerns. More than that, the very nature of the business seems to be such that unless the Government shall take a hand in the question there must be a still greater concentration of control and ownership of the hydroelectric business. This is a class of business that must be engaged in on more than a minute scale. If the electric-power company in your city charges extortionate rates, a new company can not very satisfactorily be organized, enter the business with limited capital, and proceed to compete with the older and probably large institution already in existence. The earlier institution in all probability will have the most available source for the development of hydroelectric power; in all probability the second company to enter the field would need to expend vastly more in the development of plant than the company already in existence, and the very conditions surrounding this industry keep out competition. The fact that the plant for the development of the water power must depend upon rivers and streams, reservoir sites, waterfalls, and other natural agencies that can not be placed at will by people, however interested, means that the hydroelectric business tends to become a monopoly. As the people of the country are vitally interested in the question, and as prices to the consumer can not meet the ordinary laws of competition, we must consider the question of the people's interests from the standpoint either of Government ownership—and by Government I mean Government either of Nation, the State, or the municipality—or we must handle this business, which is essentially a public-service business, by means of definitely constituted commissions, whose province will be to fix the rates that will be charged for the service rendered.

As I shall indicate later, I do not believe this latter will prove satisfactory, and, as I shall point out, municipal plants are rendering the same service for less cost to the people than are private concerns.

SHALL WE ENCOURAGE MUNICIPAL DEVELOPMENT?

Shall we encourage municipal development of hydroelectric energy? So far as I am personally concerned I have no hesitation in answering affirmatively, and I shall tell you why.

Reviewing the history of our country from the beginning from the standpoint of municipalities' or States' participation in affairs that might be done by the private individual, it is interesting to note the line of cleavage that at an early date began to assert itself.

There never was a time in the history of our country or in colonial history when the question of taxation was not handled by the State or some municipality under the State—contrasting markedly with the condition that existed in the Roman Empire 2,000 years ago when the franchise or right to raise taxes in a certain province would be sold to some individual or group of individuals who were supposed to have ability to meet their obligation to the State and who in turn would collect the taxes from the people. Something of this same system has been employed in other countries in later times, but, as I said, in the United States and in the Colonies prior to their organization into our Federal Government we had gotten by that stage, and the State or some municipality thereunder has uniformly exercised this function of government.

With regard to road building, it was somewhat different in our own country. While road building from the very earliest days was, in large part, a community matter, a county, or State matter, and even 100 years ago a matter for the Federal Government, yet there were many roads built and maintained by private owners, and the people generally were compelled to pay tribute in the way of tolls to the owners of these roads. I have driven by the old toll stations in Pennsylvania, in Massachusetts, and elsewhere. I recall even that in so new a State as Idaho there were toll roads, certain highways were maintained by means of the private franchise granted to the individual, the grantee maintaining the road and recouping himself by charging a fee for traveling the same. But we are abolishing private roads; we are abolishing tollgates.

In connection with toll roads, I should not omit to mention ferries and ferryboats, which in many States even to-day are maintained as private institutions under franchises granted by State authority. The owner of the franchise maintains and operates his ferryboat; the people who cross the river pay toll for the service rendered.

Even bridges are sometimes constructed by private individuals under franchise. Across the Snake River, between Idaho and the State of Washington, there was built the great Lewiston-Clarkston bridge, a bridge that for many years was maintained by private interests which received a revenue from the traveling public for the use of the bridge. Later this bridge was purchased by the States of Washington and Idaho.

Our rivers have been handled in much the same way as have our highways. Many of our rivers from very early times have been improved almost exclusively by the State or by different States or by the State in the larger sense—the Federal Government. On the other hand, many of our rivers have been improved by those to whom franchises have been granted for logging or other purposes, the grantee having the right of use of the river in compensation for the improvements made.

More and more, however, we are drifting away from this system of river improvement, and the Federal Government and the States, secondarily, are carrying forward this great work.

With our harbors, for the most part, the work of improvement has been carried on by the Federal Government or by the State. True even here, through a system of private ownership of dockage facilities, private interests have, to some extent, helped in this work, and have recouped themselves by charges made for the use of our docks.

Now, it is perfectly conceivable that all harbor-improvement work on our thousands of miles of coastal line could be carried on by private individuals and corporations which would be under the Federal Government to insure faithful execution of their work and which would recoup themselves and make their profits by charging the people for the use of the harbors. This would be a perfectly feasible system, and the Government could receive some revenue through leasing harbor rights. Yet who would seriously consider private development of our harbor facilities?

So we could carry on our river-improvement work through our country; so our highway-improvement work; so our bridges could be constructed; so our ferries could be maintained; so even taxes could be collected; so our schools could be maintained; so, in fact, could many of the agencies of the Government that for many years we have come to recognize as essentially belonging to the Government as it is manifested in some form from the large superstructure, the Federal Government, on down to the government of the community, the township, or the school or road district.

The line of cleavage that seems to separate the large class of business that is handled by the individual, the agricultural business, merchandising, the various trades and professions, on the one hand, and the business of maintaining such institutions as roads, harbors, navigation, and so forth—I say the line of cleavage seems to be one that has relation to the amount of service expended in comparison with the amount of public good received.

Probably no institution that we maintain results in such tremendous general good to the public in comparison with the amount of money expended in maintaining the same and in comparison with the number of men employed, and necessarily employed, in extending and keeping up the same as the public highway. Very close to the public highway from this standpoint are our coastal harbor facilities, our rivers, public schools, and other institutions that I could mention. On the other hand, the Government, the State, would probably be quite loath to enter the field of agriculture or merchandising or maintain blacksmith shops or garages throughout the country because of the very large amount of individual attention and detail necessary for the delivery of service.

Now, let us make the application: We have here the question that has been considered for several years—the working out of the best way for the development and utilization of hydroelectric power of our country. There are some who say let the State keep its hands off; let the Government treat this business as it does farming or as it does the trades and professions. And yet is there not a very close analogy between the amount of capital to be expended, the amount of attention in upkeep, in maintaining a hydroelectric power system and the maintaining of a highway or a harbor in New York City or Philadelphia? Can not those who urge the theory that to private initiative and private development belong the great hydroelectric possibilities of the present and of the future argue by the same processes of reasoning that to the private individual belongs the right to develop the harbor in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, or San Francisco? In maintaining our harbors in these places I have mentioned, or in maintaining a river as available for safe and economical navigation, we can not overlook the fact that natural resources or advantages exist that belong not to a few but to all the people.

It is this one condition very largely that helped us from the beginning, unconsciously or otherwise, to shape the very course that we have followed. Likewise it is true when the question of development of hydroelectric power is considered, the great natural resources belong to the people. True, they are not valuable for power purposes for the development of hydroelectric energy until they have been harnessed, but the harbor at New York is not available for the ships of the world if it is filled with snags and bowlders and its channel so massed with débris that ships can not enter with safety.

Now, when a private individual is granted a right or franchise to develop a water power, true enough he invests some capital, he installs modern machinery, he assumes some risk, but the very large and constant part of that which makes his investment worth while is the contribution that the public makes in the way of the water power that it furnishes in the franchise.

MUNICIPAL AND PRIVATE POWER PLANTS AS MEASURING STICKS.

I utterly fail to see the logic of those who stand exclusively for private development of hydroelectric energy. As I see it, no harm can come; but, on the other hand, probably much good, from municipal development. Most of the development that has occurred in the past has been through private means. Yet not all.

In the report of the Senate Committee on Public Lands in the Sixty-fourth Congress on the water-power bill, Secretary Lane is quoted as advising that out of 7,000,000 horsepower developed in the United States in 1913, 20 companies or groups of interests controlled 6,267,318 horsepower. Further, he advised that in the Western States of California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, and Washington, out of 1,135,400 developed horsepower, large corporations controlled and owned 1,023,700, leaving but 111,700 horsepower in the hands of small developers.

He states that in California 92 per cent of the developed power is owned by large corporations and 8 per cent by small owners. In Oregon 90 per cent is owned by large companies, 10 per cent by small.

He further states that with but few exceptions the valuable power sites on lands not owned by the Federal Government have passed into private ownership in perpetuity.

There are upward of 100 cities in the United States to-day that have developed electric power for their people's use. With the close analogy between the development by municipalities of electric power and the maintenance of a municipal water system, as is very common, why is it not the part of wisdom to permit municipalities to engage in developing electric power if they so desire?

Municipally owned plants and privately owned plants would serve to check each the other. The people would soon learn whether through public management waste exists and whether through private ownership inordinate rates are charged.

The other day I was talking to a gentleman who had been a professor in the University of Idaho for several years, and he told me of a remark made to him by the manager of one of the large private hydroelectric power companies in the West that must face the competition in the region of country that is served by a municipal plant that exists for the purpose of serving a city of some 12,000 people. The manager of the private concern told the college professor that it would be worth $1,000,000 to his company if they could be rid of this vexatious municipal plant in their midst. Now, how would it be worth $1,000,000? Why, because there would be no measuring stick in the community by which the people could be constantly gauging the question of justice or injustice that was meted out to them by the private concern in rates charged and in service rendered. So it would work out in other places.

Another reason why I am in favor of making the opportunities greater for municipal development instead of relying upon the acquisition of properties after they shall be developed by private individuals and when the leases shall have expired is because I want to avoid the difficulty of handling the question of values when power plants shall be taken over by the Government or by the State or municipality.

We all know the habits of individuals, and especially of corporations. Directors are anxious to make the best showing possible for their stockholders by magnifying the value of properties that are in their possession.

I recall that Sir Adam Beck, in his testimony, told how a group of men some years ago at Ottawa secured the rights to generate power and secured control of lands for which, as I understand, $1,400 was paid. Nothing was done with this, and the Hydroelectric Power Commission, desiring to take over the rights of this group of men in the development of power for the city of Ottawa, approached the owners of the rights and asked them for a price. What did the owners ask for the rights? One thousand four hundred dollars plus a reasonable rate of interest? Not at all.

Would they have been content with merely doubling their money? Not at all. They were not content by multiplying their investment by 10, by 100, or 1,000; but they asked of the municipal organization of the Province $3,000,000 for property that had cost them $1,400 not many years before. You have all heard of instances of that character. Within the present Congress it has been pointed out time and time again how property right here in the District of Columbia, where assessment records are available, where property values can be obtained with the minimum of time and care, suddenly assumes an enormous value when the Government wants the property.

The same was true, as I recall, touching those who purchased some of the land and buildings down at Jamestown that were utilized in connection with the Jamstown Fair and then were quite willing in this war emergency to part with them to the Government at a price that was outrageous in comparison with that which it had cost. We fought that question out a year ago.

The adoption of the amendments that I shall propose will remove the necessity of meeting just such problems as these.

THE ONTARIO SYSTEM—AN INTERESTING OBJECT LESSON.

One of the most interesting things in connection with the study of development of hydroelectric power is the history of the Hydroelectric Power Commission of the Province of Ontario in our neighboring country to the north.

The use of electric power for manufacturing purposes and even for lighting in its largest aspect has a comparatively short history. The great development in hydroelectric power has been practically limited to the last 25 or 30 years. The people of the Province of Ontario some 18 years ago began to realize not only the great opportunities for the use of electric power, they realized that they were remote from coal and fuel oils, and they realized further that they were paying very high rates for the power that was furnished them by private institutions. Accordingly, in 1900 the Board of Trade of the City of Toronto made application to the legislature of the Province for authority to undertake the development and transmission of electric power from Niagara Falls.

At that time the Province had already granted leases to several private concerns. The application on the part of the city was rejected but the agitation continued, and two years later a large convention was called of municipalities from the great southwestern portion of Ontario, embracing towns and cities in a region some 150 or 200 miles north and south by probably more than 300 miles east and west. A committee was appointed from this convention to confer with the Government with the object in view of securing legislation that would enable the municipalities to undertake the development of electric power.

The Province proceeded rather deliberately, and a commission of inquiry was appointed under the legislation that was enacted in 1905. The chairman of this commission was Sir Adam Beck, whose testimony appears in part 3 of the Water-Power Hearings before the special committee of the House of Representatives. This commission was made up of men of very responsible character; Sir Adam Beck, himself a manufacturer, and one or two other manufacturers were upon the commission, and in addition an eminent electrical engineer and expert, Prof. Fessenden.

This commission went into the subject carefully and made its report, and the Legislature of Ontario, by act of May 14, 1906, created the Hydroelectric Power Commission of Ontario. Sir Adam Beck was appointed chairman and was, in fact, made a member of the Province cabinet without portfolio.

The testimony of Sir Adam Beck before the committee is intensely interesting. He tells the history of how the commission began the development of its work in Ontario, and how for a number of years its work consisted largely in being a sort of go-between or middleman between the large producers of electric power and the municipalities in Ontario. He tells further of the acquisition of plants and systems and franchises that had been granted to private concerns. He tells of the development of projects from the very beginning whose development has been carried forward under the commission. He tells of absorption by the commission of 86 different plants and the taking over of the great work that they were doing. He tells further of supplying electric power to 225 municipalities, of which thirty-odd are townships throughout Ontario. He tells of various systems that are being operated under this commission and of the development of resources and assets of the combined municipalities until to-day they have a value of something like $70,000,000, and upon the basis of plans that have already been laid out they will have a value of $100,000,000 within about three or four years.

The practically important part of the history that Sir Adam Beck told to the committee is that which has to do with the price for which electricity is furnished to the people of the Province. I have been accustomed to paying for the electric lighting of my home at the rate of 10 cents or 11 cents per kilowatt hour, whether in the city of Washington or in my home in Idaho. I am somewhat familiar with the rates that are being charged to other consumers throughout the United States by private concerns. It was a striking commentary on the work of this Ontario commission when I discovered in the testimony of Sir Adam Beck that the highest rates per kilowatt hour in the 225 municipalities that have become part of this greater municipality was a little more than 3 cents per kilowatt hour, and that in all the homes in the cities where service could be rendered most advantageously the cost was as low as 1 cent; the average was between 2 cents and 3 cents and not 7 cents, 8 cents, 10 cents, or more, as is the case within the United States.

Now listen further. Sir Adam Beck's testimony in the matter of comparative rates charged consumers in various cities of the Province of Ontario is highly illuminating. He points out that in Toronto in 1912, before the municipal commission began to supply power to the city, the rates charged the people were 8 cents per kilowatt hour, plus 25 cents per month meter rental. By 1916 the rates had been cut down to 2½ cents per kilowatt hour, and last year the commercial rates for lighting averaged 2 cents per kilowatt hour in Toronto, and no charge, as I understand, was made for the meter.

More than that, in 1912 there were 11,959 consumers of electricity, as against 52,000 consumers under municipal control last year.

With regard to the city of Hamilton, Sir Adam Beck said that prior to the entrance of the municipal commission into the business of supplying electric power to the people they were charged by private concerns 8 cents per kilowatt, plus 25 cents per month meter rental. Under the municipal competition the rates were promptly scaled down to 2½ cents, with no charges on the meter, and last year the rates averaged 1.32 cents per kilowatt hour and no extra charges. In Hamilton, in 1913, there were 6,550 consumers, while in 1916 there were 13,000.

Take Kitchener, a smaller city, with only 15,000 inhabitants, domestic rates were 11 cents per kilowatt hour, plus 25 cents per month for meter rent, prior to the entrance of the municipal commission into the field. After the latter entered the field the cost was reduced to 3.5 cents per kilowatt hour.

In Galt, another city of 12,000 or 15,000, the rates were reduced from 11 cents to 2.8 cents after the commission entered the field.

Sir Adam Beck further says that the domestic and commercial rate averages in the Province of Ontario have been reduced to 2½ cents per kilowatt hour.

He has pointed out in his testimony how the rates have been scaled down year by year, and upon the basis of saving, in a population made up of 1,500,000 people, there was saved in the year 1916, in comparison with the year 1913, the vast amount of $2,380,000.

The demand for municipal service is not limited in the Province of Ontario to the members of a political party nor to a class. The demand, as nearly as I can gather it, seems well-nigh universal. The merchant wants it because of the economy in lighting and heating of his store; the manufacturer wants it because of the saving in power charges; the newspaper publisher wants it because of the convenience of electric power and the small cost to him in his business; the dairyman, the farmer, the miller, the warehouseman all demand this power, and it is remarkable how many are the people in Canada who are utilizing electricity at this time, apart even from those who ask for municipal development that they may obtain light and that in that cold climate they may obtain a cheap and convenient and clean method of heating their homes which is common practice.

CRITICISM OF THE ONTARIO SYSTEM.

In referring as I have to the Ontario system and to the testimony of Sir Adam Beck, the chairman of the hydroelectric commission, I would not have it understood that there is no opposition. If we may judge by the votes that have been cast in Ontario, it would seem that the people are almost unanimously in favor of the system; but there is a severe criticism in the volume entitled "An Expensive Experiment," published in 1913, from the pen of a distinguished American, Mr. Reginald P. Bolton, member of the American Institute of Consulting Engineers and numerous other organizations, that suggests the eminence of this authority.

I do not know what Mr. Bolton's idea may be to-day, but his idea five years ago was unfavorable to the Ontario system. He States that the popular approval in Canada as indicated by the vote is apparent rather than real, because of the fact that those eligible to vote do not represent the entire voting population. He further points out that the Province itself is burdened by the hydroelectric commission, and that thereby the people of the Province, whether they use electricity or not, are, in part, paying for a service that is rendered to only a limited number of people. He urges that the experiment has not added to the economic welfare of the community to any appreciable extent, but that it has involved the Province and the municipalities in a large addition to their existing indebtedness. He urges that competition has been unfair toward those who have owned private plants in that private-plant owners have burdens to keep up that the municipality does not have, and that the municipal commission has certain prerogatives not possessed by private concerns.

He urges again that the expense of furnishing electricity is not altogether capable of being measured under the present system in terms of kilowatt-hour charges, but that some expenses must be borne by what might be regarded as taxation in the nature of improvement taxes, as, for instance, where abutting property owners are charged a certain amount by the extension of the system along roads or thoroughfares.

Again, he urges that it is unfair to the public that the hydoelectric power commission has been productive of considerable inequality, that facts are concealed from the public, and that the financial affairs of the organization were not at the time he made his study of satisfactory character,

I felt that it would not be just in me to refer to the testimony of the chairman of this hydroelectric commission of the Province of Ontario without at the same time calling attention to the fact that criticisms are leveled against the work of the commission. I will say, however, I am profoundly impressed by the testimony of Sir Adam Beck, and surely it is worth while for our municipalities to examine into the question if even one-half that he has told should be found applicable to conditions within the United States.

THE SENATE BILL CONTRASTED WITH THE HOUSE BILL.

At this point you might be interested in noticing just what the essential points of difference are between the Senate bill and the House bill. The Senate bill applies only to navigable streams. The House bill applies to navigable streams and nonnavigable streams. The Senate bill places the power entirely in the hands of the Secretary of War. The House bill creates a Federal power commission composed of the Secretaries of War, the Interior, and Agriculture.

Both bills provide for a leasing system.

The Senate bill fixes an arbitrary period of 50 years for which leases may be issued; the House bill provides that the lease period may not be more than 50 years. The Senate bill provides that at the expiration of 50 years the project may be acquired by the Government at a "value" attained upon agreement by the Secretary of War and the grantee. The House bill provides that at the expiration of the lease the Government may take over the improvements and works that have been added by the lessee at a cost to the Government of net investment on the part of the company or lessee. Both bills attempt to provide against restraint of trade, against combinations looking to the holding up of prices charged; and the House bill specifically provides that the State may have the authority of fixing the service charges, and in the absence of State machinery for the carrying forward of this work the responsibility shall be placed in the commission. The House bill further provides that the Government itself may undertake the development of water power, and apparently authorizes the commission to give preference in the issuance of licenses to States and municipalities.

In my judgment the House bill is far more in accord with the needs and demands of the time than is the Senate bill. It is more in accord because it meets the entire situation touching our public waters and their use. It is more in accord because there is the possibility lodged in the commission of making a lease for a shorter period of time than 50 years; and it is more in accord, in my judgment, because I believe the terms of what may be known as the recapture clause are more satisfactory in the House bill than in the Senate measure.

There is one question, however, that it seems to me has not been given the attention that it deserves in either the Senate bill or in the bill reported in the House, and that is the proposition of opportunity for the people to develop hydroelectric power through States or municipalities. True enough on the face of things, it appears from the House bill that the opportunity is held out to States and municipalities to engage in hydroelectric development of power. True enough States and municipalities may be given something of a preference in the issuance of permits, but I believe we have failed to recognize this fact, that States and municipalities are slow to act and that no matter what public sentiment may be, no matter if it is entirely crystallized in favor of municipal ownership, under the cumbersome means that exists for the expression of opinion upon the part of the municipal body or upon the part of a State, the most valuable water-power sites will pass into the hands of private individuals or corporations before the States or municipalities will have an opportunity under the law to assert their rights. If they do, and then if municipalities develop more difficult projects, you can well understand the unfair comparison that would constantly be made between the two systems, it being overlooked that the private concerns have the easy projects and the municipalities the hard.

Mr. Chairman, I shall print with my remarks, for the convenience of Members, the amendments that I have referred to and that I propose to offer, and shall plan to give attention to each one of them as they shall be reached under the five-minute rule.

In brief, these amendments provide:

First, that within the definition of a municipality shall be "hydroelectric districts";

Second, that for a period of five years after any temporary permit or license shall be issued to a private concern, the State in which the power project is located, or the municipal district to which it pertains, shall have the option of taking over the project upon compensating the private concern in an amount not greater than the expenditures it has incurred, together with interest upon the same;

Third, that the maximum term of lease shall be not to exceed 30 years instead of 50 years;

Fourth, that the commission shall give preference to applications for permits to States or municipalities rather than to permit the commission to do so in its discretion; and

Fifth, that at the expiration of a lease, preference for its continuance shall be given by the commission to the State in which the power project is located or the municipality to which it pertains.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS BY MR. FRENCH.

Amend page 25, line 19: After the word "district" insert ", hydroelectric district."

Amend page 29, line 11: After the colon, following the words "herein provided," insert the following: "Provided, That when application for temporary permit or license shall be made by citizens, association of citizens, or corporation, the commission shall certify the application and the terms of the same to the governor of the State and to the chairman of the board of county commissioners or other similar supervisory county board of the county or counties to which the application for temporary permit or license pertains, and shall cause a copy of said notice to be published once every week for four successive weeks in a newspaper of general circulation in said county or counties, and the State, county, hydroelectric district, or other municipality within which the application for temporary permit or license last mentioned pertains shall have the option for a period of five years of taking over as though having made the original application for license all rights, leases, and project property of every description of said citizen, association of citizens, or corporation, paying therefor an amount not in excess of the total amount of money expended on said project, including interest, by such citizen, association of citizens, or corporation, and thereupon the commission shall take up any preliminary permit or license theretofore issued and issue a new preliminary permit or license, as the case may be, to said State or municipality, and in case the grantee of the preliminary permit or license and the State or municipality shall be unable to agree upon the amount due the grantee of the preliminary permit or license from said State or municipality, then, and in that event, the commission shall determine the amount to be paid, and the amount so determined shall be final under the terms of the preliminary permit or license."

Amend page 32, line 24: Strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

Amend page 33, line 11: Following the word "commission" strike out the remainder of the line 11 and all of lines 12, 13, and 14, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "shall give preference to applications thereof by States and municipalities conserving and utilizing in the highest."

Amend page 43, line 8: Strike out period and insert colon and the following: "Provided, That preference shall be given to the State in which the project is situated or the municipality to which it pertains in the issuance of a new license in event of application therefor."

Amend page 49, line 25: Strike out the words "retain the same" and lines 1, 2, and 3, on page 50.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WEBB, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 1419, the water-power bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BRAND, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence indefinitely, on acount of important business.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, general debate on the bill having been closed, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the business of Calendar Wednesday to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to do away with the business on Calendar Wednesday to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman have any objection to coupling with that a request that we consider unobjected bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar to-morrow until 2 o'clock p. m.? The reason I make the suggestion is that when the last Unanimous Consent Calendar was called there were some 30 or 40 bills not reached. Unanimous-consent day was passed on Monday, because of the death of Senator GALLINGER. The next unanimous-consent day will fall on Labor Day, and last year we adjourned because of that holiday. There are many Members interested in bills which they would like to have passed. I think the calendar could be called and the unobjected bills disposed of by 2 o'clock.

Mr. SIMS. I will agree to the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to do away with the business on Calendar Wednesday to-morrow, coupled with the further request that after the prayer, the reading of the Journal, and the disposition of the business on the Speaker's table, the Unanimous Consent Calendar be taken up and considered not later than 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the whole request?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman object to dispensing with the business of Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 21, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DEWALT: A bill (H. R. 12786) to authorize the Philadelphia, Harrisburg & Pittsburgh Railroad Co., its lessees, successors, and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Susquehanna River, from the city of Harrisburg, Dauphin County, Pa., to the borough of Lemoyne, Cumberland County, Pa.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY: A bill (H. R. 12787) to amend the narcotic act; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 12788) granting a pension to Jacob L. Cunningham; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 12789) granting an increase of pension to Stacey E. Hartley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. POU (by request): A bill (H. R. 12790) for the relief of the heirs of R. F. Graves, jr.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. POLK: A bill (H. R. 12791) granting an increase of pension to David A. Conner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ROUSE. A bill (H. R. 12792) granting an increase of pension to Greer T. Neal; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHERWOOD: A bill (H. R. 12793) for the relief of Nathan Manzer; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12794) granting a pension to Etta A. Hood; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TIMBERLAKE: A bill (H. R. 12795) granting an increase of pension to Nelson Aumick; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WINGO: A bill (H. R. 12796) granting an increase of pension to George W. Tilman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Resolutions of the Presbyterian, Methodist, and United Brethren Churches, of Pataskala, Ohio, in favor of amendment 18 to the Constitution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Papers to accompany a bill to increase the pension of Stacey E. Hartley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of citizens of Roscoe, Ill., opposing the Angelus resolution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SCULLY: Resolution from Rev. James G. Mason, of Metuchey, N. J., favoring war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SIMS: Petitions of various citizens of Scotts Hill, Tenn., against reducing the draft age to 18 years; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SMITH of Idaho: Resolutions of the Rotary Club and of the Greater Twin Falls Club, both of Twin Falls, Idaho, favoring the enactment of House bill 12774, to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 21, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Good Lord, deliver us from the hyphenated American, the pro-German, the spy, the profiteer, the pacifist, the slacker, and all who would retard the prosecution of the war for human rights, human happiness, in the establishment of a permanent, world-wide peace; for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MERCHANDISE DONATED TO THE RED CROSS.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12704) to authorize the importation without the payment of duty of sundry articles for the American National Red Cross to be donated or used by it solely to or for the benefit of the land or naval forces of the United States or its allies, or for the relief of the civilian population of the United States or of its allies.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 12704. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the bill has been reported only recently, and I think it should be read first.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That during the continuance of the state of war now existing, and during the period of one year thereafter, there may be imported into the United States free of the payment of any import duty any articles of clothing, medicines, drugs, hospital supplies and equipment, goods, wool and cotton, and the products thereof, donated by any person or persons abroad and consigned to the American National Red Cross: Provided, That such articles or supplies are not to be sold but are only to be donated or used by it solely to or for the benefit of the land or naval forces of the United States or of the allies of the United States, or for the relief of the civilian population of the United States or any of its said allies.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry this act into effect.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would the gentleman from Tennessee mind explaining what is intended in lines 4 and 5, on page 2, by the language—or for the relief of the civilian population of the United States or any of its said allies.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that that relates only to such disasters as storms and cyclones, when the Red Cross is suddenly called on for relief, as, for example, at the time of the Dayton flood. Those things are not expected to occur at all, but the language is inserted there because it is a part of the Red Cross work.

Mr. WALSH. Disasters such as fires and floods?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes; calamities that might call for Red Cross aid in line with its usual work.

Mr. WALSH. But why should this privilege be given in order to relieve that class of disaster during this war period any more than during peace times.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The purpose of the bill is to permit during the war the importation of large consignments of knitted and other goods that are prepared by Red Cross organizations in all the South American countries and in the Philippine Islands and in other countries which come in during the war only. They are not in operation during peace times as a rule, and this is to get them to the Red Cross organization on their way primarily to the Army and Navy at the front.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk again read the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a patriotic address delivered at the Knickerbocker Theater, in Washington, on Memorial Day, by my colleague, Mr. JAMES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—THE SELECTIVE-DRAFT LAW.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 12731, providing for the new draft, which is reported to-day from the Committee on Military Affairs, be set down as a special order for to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the new draft bill, H. R. 12731, be made the special order for to-morrow, not to interfere with the ordinary business on the Speaker's table, or with revenue bills or appropriation bills, or conference reports.

Mr. DENT. And that the order continue until the bill is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. And that it be the continuing order until the bill is disposed of.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—not that I am going to object—I do not think the bill ought to be displaced by a revenue bill or any other bill while it is under consideration, and I hope the gentleman from Alabama will take that out of his request.

The SPEAKER. He did not put it in. That was put in by the Chair.

Mr. DENT. The Speaker put that in; and I was quite willing to accept the Speaker's amendment, because I am sure that there will be no revenue bill reported to interfere with it.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the Speaker will take that out.

The SPEAKER. Very well; the Chair will take it out. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and, like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], I do not expect to object—of course, the water-power bill is the continuing order. This is not a privileged matter, but all will realize that it is a matter that ought to have right of way. Therefore I shall not object; but I shall ask that as soon as the bill is passed, we resume consideration of the water-power bill under the existing order.

The SPEAKER. That will be done, anyway. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, the new draft bill, H. R. 12731, be made the special order and the continuing order until disposed of. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WINGO indefinitely.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the roster of the committees.

The Clerk proceeded with the call.

When the Committee on Foreign Affairs was called,

INDEMNITY OF THE GREEK SUBJECTS.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I call up the bill (H. R. 69) on the Union Calendar, and I want to ask unanimous consent to substitute for it the bill (S. 4527) which has passed the Senate and is on the Speaker's table.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman indicate the number on the calendar?

Mr. FLOOD. The bill I am calling up is a bill to authorize the payment of indemnities for the Governments of Austria-Hungary, Greece, and Turkey for injuries inflicted on their nationals during riots occurring in South Omaha, February 21, 1909. The bill as reported strikes out the appropriation for the subjects of Austria-Hungary and Turkey and applies simply to the subjects of Greece.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman indicate the number on the calendar?

Mr. FLOOD. No. 82 on the Union Calendar. Mr. Speaker, I call up that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up the bill H. R. 69 and asks leave to substitute for the bill the bill S. 4527 of similar tenor. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the Senate bill identical with the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. FLOOD. I think so.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman thinks so. I think the Senate bill should be first read before unanimous consent is granted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4527) to authorize the payment of indemnities to the Government of Greece for injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots occurring in South Omaha, Nebr., February 21, 1909.

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as a matter of grace and without reference to the question of liability therefor, to the Government of Greece, as full indemnity on account of injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots which occurred in South Omaha, Nebr., on February 21, 1909, as set forth in the message of the President of the United States dated January 14, 1916, $40,000.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let it be considered in the committee.

Mr. FLOOD. All right.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] will take the chair.

The House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 4527, with Mr. SMALL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 4527, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4527) to authorize the payment of indemnities to the Government of Greece for injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots occurring in South Omaha, Nebr., February 21, 1909.

Mr. FLOOD. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia, if I may. The bill as passed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House authorized the payment of citizens of three different countries——

Mr. FLOOD. No——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. One was Turkey, one was Austria-Hungary, and one was Greece.

Mr. FLOOD. The bill as introduced had such a provision in it, but the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House struck out the provision for the payments to the Governments of Austria-Hungary and Turkey.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I really meant to ask the question in that way, and it is my mistake I did not. Will the gentleman state to the committee why Turkey was cut out? Now, I can see the reason in reference to Austria-Hungary, because we are at war with that country, but we are supposed to be in the piping times of peace with Turkey.

Mr. FLOOD. We have no diplomatic relation with Turkey, and that was the reason we did not make provision for the payment of money in this bill to her nationals.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The absence of diplomatic relations did not prevent injuries to the citizens of Turkey in South Omaha?

Mr. FLOOD. We had diplomatic relations with Turkey then; that was nine years ago when it happened.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman think we could make reparation to those injured citizens of Turkey even if we have no diplomatic relations with Turkey at the present time?

Mr. FLOOD. The payment of the money would go through the Government. We would pay the money to the Greek legation here as we would pay to the Turkish embassy if we had one. There is no embassy here to receive it, and we do not think it would meet with the approval of the country anyhow.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Could we turn it over to the Alien Property Custodian?

Mr. FLOOD. Well, he has got money enough to do—he has got trouble enough handling the money he gets from the sale of alien property here.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Has the gentleman any additional information as to the beneficiaries of this Greek fund in addition to that which is in the report of the committee?

Mr. FLOOD. No, I have not; but the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LOBECK] is very familiar with the whole situation. All the information I have is contained in the report of the committee. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. LOBECK. What is the question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think it is advisable to have something placed in the record of the proceedings of the House of the conditions in South Omaha that led to this riot.

Mr. FLOOD. If the gentleman from Nebraska will permit, I would be glad to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating the report of the committee that gives the whole history of this transaction and contains all the information I have, and then in addition to that the gentleman from Nebraska can give the information he has which is not contained in this report.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The report referred to is as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 69) to authorize the payment of indemnities to the Governments of Austria-Hungary, Greece, and Turkey for injuries inflicted on their nationals during riots occurring in South Omaha, Nebr., February 21, 1909, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with amendments and recommends that the bill as amended do pass.

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "Governments" and insert the word "Government" in lieu thereof.

Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "and Turkey."

Page 2, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "and to the Government of Turkey, $230; in all, $41,030."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to authorize the payment of indemnities to the Government of Greece for injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots occurring in South Omaha, Nebr., February 21, 1909."

Your committee deemed it advisable, in view of the fact that this country is at war with Austria-Hungary and that the Government of Turkey has severed diplomatic relations, to eliminate from the provisions of the bill the payment of indemnities to the nationals of those Governments for injuries received in the riots referred to.

The facts connected with the riots aforesaid and which form the basis of these claims are fully set forth in the letter of the Secretary of State to the President, as follows:

THE PRESIDENT:

On February 21, 1909, a riot occurred in the city of South Omaha, Nebr., which was directed against Greek subjects resident in that place. Personal injuries and property losses were inflicted on the victims of acts of violence committed by the rioters, and approximately 1,200 Greeks were driven from the city.

Prior to these riots, a feeling of hostility appears to have existed among the people of South Omaha against Greek subjects there resident, caused, as represented by residents of the city, by the manner of living of some of these Greeks, it being alleged that they lived in most insanitary surroundings; by the lawlessness and offensive conduct of some of them in congregating in a certain quarter of the city and repeatedly insulting women passing along the streets; and by the fact that Greek laborers were brought into South Omaha to be employed in packing houses, where they worked for less wages than those ordinarily paid to the residents of the city. On the night of February 19, 1909, a policeman named Edward Lowry was shot and killed by a Greek named John Masourides, whom the officer had arrested. Bitter feeling was aroused as a result of the killing of the officer, and on the following day there was circulated in the city a petition signed by some 500 persons which read as follows:

"Whereas a condition of outlawry exists in this city among the Greeks, and in many instances a flagrant disregard and insolence of our laws and ordinances of this city has occurred during the past year; and

"Whereas the so-called quarters of the Greeks are infested by Greeks who have attacked our women, insulted pedestrians upon the streets, openly maintained gambling dens and many other forms of viciousness; and

"Whereas on the evening of February 19, 1909, these conditions culminated in the cowardly and brutal murder of Officer Ed. Lowry, one of the most highly respected citizens of this city: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the undersigned citizens and taxpayers of the city, hereby believe that a mass meeting should be held on Sunday afternoon, February 21, at the city hall, to take such steps, and to adopt such measures as will effectually rid the city of the undesirable Greeks, and thereby remove the menacing conditions that threaten the very life and welfare of South Omaha."

A mass meeting of citizens was held on Sunday, February 21, 1909, and the situation with respect to the Greek laborers was discussed. Shortly after this meeting closed an attack was begun on the Greeks, which lasted well into the evening. Stores were broken into, property destroyed, and some personal injuries inflicted. The attack had the effect of driving the Greeks from the city. A number of subjects of Austria-Hungary and of Turkey also appear to have suffered from the fury of the mob. These persons were probably mistaken for Greeks.

It appears that some of the rioters were arrested, but so far as the Department of State is informed no persons were convicted of any offense, for the reason, as has been represented to the department, that it was not possible for the prosecuting authorities to obtain the necessary evidence to bring about convictions.

According to the department's information, no steps have been taken by the injured persons to redress their grievances through recourse to local tribunals. The State authorities, through the governor of Nebraska, have completely disclaimed all legal liability for the injuries inflicted on these foreigners. According to opinions received by the department from local officials in Nebraska, it appears that under the local laws no legal action can be maintained against either the municipality of South Omaha (now a part of the city of Omaha) or against the State of Nebraska in a case of this character.

The Governments of Austria-Hungary, Greece, and Turkey have asked the Government of the United States to pay indemnities for the injuries inflicted on their nationals. The sum of $5,891.50 was requested by the Government of Austria-Hungary, $153,533 by the Greek Government, and $1,984 by the Government of Turkey.

The Greek Government has represented to the department that from a report of an investigation of the deplorable occurrences in question, made by a legal adviser of the Greek Legation in this country, it conclusively appears that the mass meeting held on February 21, 1909, and the circumstances leading up to it, gave the local authorities warning which should have prompted them to take suitable steps to prevent occurrences such as those which followed the meeting, and that the police authorities did not in a determined manner seek to put an end to the riots and to protect the Greeks, but were half-hearted in their efforts. This report also furnishes the basis of the amount of the indemnity which the Greek Government requests this Government to pay on account of the property losses and personal injuries sustained by Greek subjects.

An investigation was also made by an official of the Department of Justice of the facts and circumstances in relation to the riots, including the losses sustained by the foreign subjects in whose behalf claims have been presented to this Government. The evidence and conclusions presented by this official in a report which he made of his investigation are considerably at variance with the evidence and conclusions contained in the report made by the Greek Legation's legal adviser, both as regards the responsibility of the police authorities for the violence of the riots and as regards the amount of the damages suffered by the victims.

It has naturally been impossible for this Government and for the representatives of the Governments of Austria-Hungary, Greece, and Turkey to obtain satisfactory evidence in some cases as to the property losses and personal injuries suffered by victims of these riots.

In view of the fact that subjects of a friendly nation were driven from the city of South Omaha, their property destroyed, and personal injuries inflicted on them, and in view of the action taken by the Government of the United States with respect to claims of this nature in the past, the Secretary of State has the honor to recommend that Congress be requested to make, as an act of grace and without reference to the question of the liability of the United States, an appropriation of $41,030 to pay the following amounts to the Governments of Austria-Hungary,

Greece, and Turkey: Eight hundred dollars to the Government of Austria-Hungary, $40,000 to the Government of Greece, and $230 to the Government of Turkey.

In this relation the Secretary of State has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to their transmission to Congress for the consideration of that body in connection with this case, copies of correspondence in relation to the claims presented by these three Governments.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT LANSING.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 11, 1916.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. WALSH. Well, how much time?

Mr. FLOOD. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. LOBECK. Five minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, the history of this Greek case I have written down in a few lines that the House may understand how this bill is up for consideration at this time.

On February 21, 1909, a riot occurred in the city of South Omaha which was directed against Greek subjects, resident of South Omaha in that city. These men—Greeks—were many of them in business and many were employed in the packing industries and kindred plants in South Omaha.

On February 19, 1909, a policeman named Edward Lowry was shot and killed by a Greek named John Masourides, whom the officer had arrested. There had been before this considerable feeling against the Greeks on account of reported insanitary methods of living, and their offenses toward women; also that they worked for less wages; it was also reported they were being brought to South Omaha by the packing houses to compete with local laborers. The killing of the officer aroused naturally enmity against the Greeks, and a riot ensued.

I wish to say, by the way, that there were several men who are good citizens in Omaha now that were there in South Omaha at the time in business and their property was destroyed and they were not mixed in this affair at all.

On February 21 a riot ensued after an indignation meeting had been held by the people gathered to discuss the matter, and much property was destroyed and some personal injuries occurred, and the innocent as well as others suffered alike.

Efforts were made to have remuneration for property destroyed with the State authorities, but the governor disclaimed all legal liabilities.

The Greek Government took the matter up with our State Department, which has looked into the matter thoroughly—see a letter to the President by the Department of State, signed by the Secretary, Hon. Robert Lansing, dated Washington, January 11, 1916, in which the President recommend in a message to the House of Representatives—see Document No. 576, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session—that an appropriation be made to pay the claim.

Senator HITCHCOCK introduced in the Sixty-fourth Congress Senate bill 3680, which was reported on favorably and passed by the Senate. This bill was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House, and reported on favorably in the Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, Report No. 1497, on February 15, 1917, recommending the payment of the claim, but was not acted on by the House before the session ended on account of the pressure of business.

On April 2, 1917, I introduced a bill, House bill 69, Sixty-fifth Congress, being the same as the one passed by the Senate in the Sixty-fourth Congress, it being referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, January 7, 1918, reported the bill favorably to the House, see Report 232, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, with amendments to strike out payment to Austria and Turkey, but favoring the payment to the Government of Greece of $40,000.

On May 11, 1918, Senator HITCHCOCK introduced in the Senate of the United States a bill known as S. 4527, which reads as follows:

A bill (S. 4527) to authorize the payment of indemnities to the Government of Greece for injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots occuring in South Omaha, Nebr., February 21, 1909.

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as a matter of grace and without reference to the question of liability therefor, to the Government of Greece, as full indemnity on account of injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots which occurred in South Omaha, Nebr., on February 21, 1909, as set forth in the message of the President of the United States dated January 14, 1916, $40,000.

On June 19, 1918, the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate reported bill S. 4527 favorably, and it was passed by the Senate and is now before the House for consideration.

There has been considerable correspondence between the Greek Government and the Department of State, which is fully covered in Calendar No. 95, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, Report No. 103 to the Senate; also in a message from the President of the United States to the House of Representatives in Document No. 576, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, of date January 14, 1916.

The House bill is now on the Union Calendar No. 82, Report No. 232, and was on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, but on the objection by a Member was stricken off, because he thought the bill ought to have more consideration. I furnished to the Member objecting a full history of the case for his consideration, which he very kindly told me he would look into thoroughly.

I hope the bill may pass and this claim, which has been thoroughly looked into by the State Department and recommended by the President, paid to the Greek Government for such disposition to the injured parties as the Greek Government deem best.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Now, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LOBECK. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Were there any American citizens in South Omaha who were damaged in their property or injured in their person during this riot?

Mr. LOBECK. There was some property that belonged to some American citizens there that was injured. I know of one case where a building was injured, but it was the only case reported to me.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Were there any American citizens injured?

Mr. LOBECK. Not so far as I know. If there was anyone injured, I am not informed.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But there was some property belonging to American citizens that was destroyed in the riot?

Mr. LOBECK. There was some property injured owned by a good friend of mine, Mr. Burkley, and I would be glad if he could be compensated.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Were there any citizens injured in their property who received any reparation, or is there any movement on foot contemplating giving them reparation from any source?

Mr. LOBECK. It was taken up by the governor of the State at the time——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. My understanding is that the American citizens who were injured in person or property are absolutely without redress.

Mr. LOBECK. I do not know if any American citizens were injured. There may have been. I can not answer from any information I have received. If injured, they should be compensated.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But some property was destroyed?

Mr. LOBECK. Some property was destroyed.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And that is the loss they must individually stand. I am informed there is no possible way in which those American citizens thus injured can be compensated for their loss.

Mr. FLOOD. They could sue the rioters and get judgment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman suggest that as a practical procedure?

Mr. FLOOD. It would not be in the case of these foreigners, but it might be in the case of an American citizen.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Assuming the people there could pick out the rioters and identify them and prove they were the ones, they could make them defendants and have a case against them in tort. But I will say to the gentleman that such individuals would be absolutely execution proof, inasmuch as they were probably lawless elements who could not respond in damages, and would not.

Mr. FLOOD. I would not think so in this case. This riot was the result of a public meeting called through publications in newspapers two or three days before and attended by people who were supposed to be very reputable citizens of Omaha, and, I assume, men with property. And the American citizen would have his remedy in court. The foreigner that was being driven out of Omaha would have no remedy practically, except through the grace and generosity of the American Government, which we have extended always in such cases and which other nations have extended to our nationals under similar circumstances.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That was the point I was proceeding to develop.

Mr. LOBECK. The Greek Government brought this matter to the attention of the State Department.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This riot occurred nine years ago. Does the gentleman know of any jurisdiction under the sun that gives a privilege of action in tort nine years after the damage is committed?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Of course, any rights anybody may have had——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LOBECK] has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five more minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield five more minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Of course, any rights anybody had to proceed in court have long since expired, and if they have not proceeded it is very evident that they could not or it would have been valueless if they had. Have any Americans proceeded in court?

Mr. LOBECK. I do not know. I have had a letter from Mr. Burkley on this subject, but he did not state his intentions.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If we give this money to these Greeks we are really giving them compensation when American citizens who are damaged in the same way and at the same time are not receiving any compensation. We are conferring a benefit upon Greek citizens that our own citizens do not have. Is not that true?

Mr. LOBECK. I do not know how far our State government went into the case to find out what the injury was.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman that when this was before the committee we gave that some little discussion, and I think that is the fact. But, as the chairman of the committee has stated, international comity through a long period of time has given basis for claims of this character. And I suppose we will have to stand for it and pay it, but I want it clearly understood that we are doing something for Greek citizens.

Mr. LOBECK. The State Department went into this matter thoroughly. They looked into the claims. The claims were a good deal larger than are allowed here, and the President, after listening to all these reports and reading them, recommended that this ought to be paid to the Greek Government for these people who were injured or whose property was destroyed.

Now, many of these people have become as good citizens of the United States as anyone, and some of them may have had their first citizen papers at the time and were in business in South Omaha, and I know several of them—they are good citizens. I can only answer for those who have since lived in Omaha. How this money will be divided among them is a matter for the Greek Government to take care of.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman assure the committee that the regularly constituted authorities in South Omaha at this time did the best they could to prevent this damage from being inflicted?

Mr. LOBECK. I think they did.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman give any details of their efforts?

Mr. LOBECK. It was done through the ordinary police channels.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, we can not hear what the gentlemen are saying, and one of the Members is a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken. The colloquy can not be heard. The committee will be in order.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. NORTON. In this case the Greek Government claims $153,000?

Mr. LOBECK. That was the original claim.

Mr. NORTON. How was $40,000 arrived at as the amount of damage?

Mr. LOBECK. By an expert legal examiner detailed from the State Department, who examined the claims and thought that $40,000 would be ample.

Mr. NORTON. Have hearings been held before the committee on the question of the amount of damages?

Mr. LOBECK. I could not tell that, because I am not a member of the committee; but I do know this, that the officer—whatever his title may be—in the State Department looked into the claims thoroughly and went to South Omaha and took every precaution to avoid making any error.

Mr. NORTON. Have hearings been held before the committee to determine the amount of damages?

Mr. FLOOD. That was determined by the investigation made by the State Department.

Mr. NORTON. By the report of the examiner of the State Department?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. The State Department found that the Greek Government claimed too much, and scaled down the claims from $153,000 to $40,000.

Mr. NORTON. Is it set out in the report—the individuals to whom these damages will go?

Mr. FLOOD. Not in the report of the committee, but the State Department has the list of the parties.

Mr. NORTON. A list of the injured parties?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. It has been filed by the minister of Greece. The gentleman who looked into the matter thoroughly was a man named Neilsen, who was designated by the State Department to look into the matter and make report. He reported some years ago.

Mr. NORTON. Did I understand the gentleman to say that in a case where an alien citizen is injured by the act of citizens of the United States he would not be permitted to go into court and sue for damages?

Mr. FLOOD. No; I did not say that. I said that in a case like this, where these people were run out by mobs or rioters, they would have no chance of obtaining redress in that community.

Mr. NORTON. I was wondering whether, if it were ascertained who did the damage, an action could be brought against them by the Greek officials.

Mr. FLOOD. There was no chance to convict them in a criminal court. There was no way by which the State government or the city government could be forced to allow damages. The public sentiment against the Greeks was such that they would never do anything to reimburse those who were injured for the injury inflicted on their property. The public sentiment was such that nothing could be done in the courts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. WALSH. I did not ask the gentleman to yield. I desire to speak in my own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this is a measure to pay $40,000 to the Government of Greece for injuries resulting from a riot occurring in 1909 in the city of Omaha, Nebr. The Greek Government, through its properly accredited representatives, I understand, filed a claim with the United States for $153,533. I submit that this is no time for Congress to be considering a claim such as this.

I see the committee has stricken out the provision whereby we should pay to Austria-Hungary the sum of $5,891.51 and to the Government of Turkey $1,984, because the chairman of the committee stated that we are at war with Austria-Hungary and we ought to be at war with Turkey, but we are not.

Mr. FLOOD. I did not state that.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Virginia says he did not state that. Perhaps that is a violent inference to draw from the statement he did make in reply to an inquiry of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], but I doubt not that he might agree that that states the exact situation, nevertheless—that we are not at war with Turkey, but there is a general impression that we ought to be.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. This riot was the result of a public meeting held in the city of Omaha some nine years ago, in which certain resolutions were passed and steps and measures recommended to be taken which would rid the city of undesirable Greeks, and thereby remove the menacing condition which threatened the very life and welfare of South Omaha. They attempted to conduct prosecutions for this lawlessness and rioting, but they were unable to convict because, as the report sets forth in the letter from the Secretary of State, they could not procure or obtain the necessary evidence, and because they could not get the necessary evidence in order to convict those who were responsible for this damage they accordingly passed it on to Uncle Sam, and they ask us here, during this war period, to pay the Government of Greece $40,000 for these injuries.

We are conferring upon the Government of Greece much greater benefits at the present time than we could confer by handing over to it $40,000 for something that occurred nine years ago. We are standing with our associate nations in this great crisis in order that the Government of Greece might not be destroyed and crushed; and I doubt not but that the assistance that we will render to Greece in this struggle will be such that after the war is over the diplomatic representatives of Greece may be willing and glad to say to our State Department that they waive all claims for damages as the result of this riot that occurred in South Omaha. It seems to me that this is no time for us to be appropriating $40,000, when we are considering, or about to consider, one of the largest revenue measures that has ever been considered in a legislative body, and certainly the largest in the history of this Nation.

Mr. FESS. And the world.

Mr. WALSH. And my friend, the gentleman from Ohio, Dr. FESS, reminds me the largest revenue measure ever considered by any legislative body in the world, and that is true. We say here that we will set aside $40,000 of that at this particular time to pay for these injuries. I submit that this measure might well be deferred until after this war is over, until we find out what the conditions are and what the situation is going to be not only with reference to the Government of Greece but with reference to the State of Nebraska, with reference to the city of South Omaha, and with reference to the facts in connection with this claim.

Now, it is rather significant that in the letter from the Secretary of State he says:

> An investigation was also made by an official of the Department of Justice of the facts and circumstances in relation to the riots, including the losses sustained by the foreign subjects in whose behalf claims have been presented to this Government. The evidence and conclusions presented by this official in a report which he made of his investigation are considerably at variance with the evidence and conclusions contained in the report made by the Greek Legation's legal adviser, both as regards the responsibility of the police authorities for the violence of the riots and as regards the amount of the damages suffered by the victims.

Why, Mr. Chairman, only a short time ago out in the West, as the result of labor disturbances, a large number of members of that organization known as the I. W. W. were run out of town and taken down to New Mexico or one of the border States. After this struggle is over I have no doubt that the Government of which many of these men are citizens, these men, many of whom are now seeking to thwart this country in prosecuting the war, can well come in here and file a claim for injuries and damages which they have had inflicted upon them. It may be that as a result of the riots at East St. Louis Uncle Sam ought to pay some of the bills in that case because rioters broke the bounds of the law and got beyond the control of the local authorities. While the victims may have all been citizens of the United States, still if we take up this sort of legislation at this particular time it is going to encourage and invite men to ask for legislation along this line in other instances.

Now, the official of the Department of Justice differs in his conclusions as to the responsibility for these injuries from the conclusions reached by the legal adviser of the Greek Legation. That is natural. The legal adviser of the Greek Legation is acting in behalf of those seeking to get the money. He wanted $153,533 for injuries inflicted upon his nationals, and the committee, in its wisdom, after due deliberation and probably after consideration of facts which have not been stated here as yet, shaved this claim down to $40,000. We do not know how many were injured, what the character of their injury was, or how many of those people were injured by men of their own nationality who might since then have become citizens of this country. But that makes no difference. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LOBECK], who represents the South Omaha district, read a statement to the committee, part of which I was fortunate enough to be able to hear, and he gave a very interesting chronological history of the attempts that have been made since its occurrence in 1909 to procure this money from the Treasury of the United States, but there was nothing there by way of justification.

I submit there has been no fact either in the letter of the Secretary of State or in the statements that have been made by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that puts this into the class of emergency urgent legislation. It is in the nature of a claim that might well be deferred until after the war is over. They have been waiting more than nine years already. These riots occurred February 21, 1909. They can wait until February 21, 1920 or 1921, at which time we hope and trust this crisis will be over and there will be nobody harmed if we defer action upon this measure at this time. The only result of the passage of this bill will be to impose this additional burden in the midst of the tremendous demands made upon the Treasury at this particular time owing to war necessities. If we defer the payment of this, it will relieve the Treasury of that demand, and I submit that the responses to the questions asked by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] are such as to show that even though this claim may have a scintilla of merit, it might well be deferred.

I desire now to direct the attention of the committee to the wording of these resolutions that were signed by some 500 persons of the noble city of South Omaha:

> Whereas a condition of outlawry exists in this city among the Greeks, and in many instances a flagrant disregard and insolence of our laws and ordinances of this city has occurred during the past year; and
> Whereas the so-called quarters of the Greeks are infested by Greeks who have attacked our women, insulted pedestrians upon the streets, openly maintained gambling dens and many other forms of viciousness; and
> Whereas on the evening of February 19, 1909, these conditions culminated in the cowardly and brutal murder of Officer Ed. Lowry, one of the most highly respected citizens in this city: Therefore be it
> Resolved, That we, the undersigned citizens and taxpayers of the city, hereby believe that a mass meeting should be held on Sunday afternoon, February 21, at the city hall, to take such steps and to adopt such measures as will effectually rid the city of the undesirable Greeks, and thereby remove the menacing conditions that threaten the very life and welfare of South Omaha.

That was followed by a mass meeting held on Sunday afternoon, and the situation was discussed, and shortly after this meeting closed an attack was begun on the Greeks which lasted well into the evening. Stores were broken into, property destroyed, and some personal injuries inflicted. The attack had the effect of driving the Greeks from the city. A number of subjects of Austria-Hungary and of Turkey also appear to have suffered from the fury of the mob. These persons were probably mistaken for Greeks. That sets forth briefly the history of this transaction. They determined to rid that city of some undesirable persons who had been insulting their women and had been violating the laws. They held a mass meeting, and later some persons attacked those persons and drove them out of town. Because they were citizens of a nation with which we are not now at war and because in driving them out of town some injury was inflicted upon them, because they were undesirable and lawless, we must now needs pay the Government of Greece $40,000 because South Omaha and its gallant crew of 500 citizens, who were willing to sign those resolutions, apparently took the law into their own hands and indulged in rioting and further lawlessness. I assume that Omaha in 1909 had arrived at that stage of civilization which enabled it to support a police force, and that the great Commonwealth of Nebraska during that remote and ancient period possibly supported a State militia, because I know that during this crisis that great State is doing its full share. But, sir, if they got into such a tangle as that at that time, it seems to me that rather than indulge in a riot they might well have called upon the governor, the commander in chief of their State militia, or upon the chief of police of South Omaha or some of the surrounding towns.

Yet we know nothing as to what steps were taken, except that the gentleman from Nebraska stated that the governor disclaimed all responsibility. Very well, he might disclaim responsibility because these people were foreigners, and it may be assumed that he or his legal advisers knew that at some time in the future, when the storm had calmed and the feeling had subsided, the very keen and astute gentleman who represents the Government of Greece in this city would see to it that claims were presented whereby $153,533 might be taken from the Treasury to pay the Government of Greece for the injuries inflicted on these undesirable lawless citizens.

I submit that it is no time for us to be passing legislation to pay any such sum, in view of the history of this particular transaction, and that the matter should be deferred until after this war is closed, when further investigation can be had, and that instead of giving the benefit of the doubt to the Greek legation and its legal adviser we should give the benefit of the doubt—in view of the representations of the Department of Justice and the investigation it has made—to the Treasury of the United States. I trust that the measure will not be passed, and I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, this is a piece of legislation that is following the precedents that have been set in similar cases in this country for a great many years. Our State and city governments do not deal with foreign governments and have nothing to do with our foreign relations. That is done by the National Government. Therefore when a question arises between a foreign government and any subdivision of this country the transaction is handled through the State Department of the National Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has stated that this is in line with precedents established for a long time by the State Department recognizing the obligation of the National Government to protect the nationals of foreign countries domiciled here. Can the gentleman give any special instances where we have heretofore reimbursed foreign governments for like instances?

Mr. FLOOD. I know that since the gentleman and myself have been in Congress a number of bills of this nature have been passed. There was one before we came here that the whole country was interested in. That was the case where some of the best citizens of New Orleans hung some Italians whom they thought were violating the laws of that State and the ordinances of the city of New Orleans and were disgracing the community, and they rose up and hung them. The gentleman will recall that instance. These Italians that were hung were supposed to belong to the Mafia. They were foreign citizens, and our Government recognized its obligation to the foreign government and paid the Italian Government so that the families of these people who were killed could be reimbursed for their killing.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, as I recollect that New Orleans incident, I believe the principal instigator was a lawyer by the name of Pendergast, and at that time the question arose whether our Government would be responsible for the neglect of the local authorities in failing to protect the citizens of foreign countries.

The Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine—and I yield in my memory to the Representatives of the Committee on Foreign Affairs—took the position that the National Government was not responsible for riots occurring in localities. I do not recall that our Government ever passed any bills since I have been in Congress of a character similar to this. If the gentleman will kindly cite one, it will perhaps refresh my memory.

Mr. FLOOD. An Italian was killed in Florida a few years ago, and Secretary Bryan recommended as a matter of grace—not as an obligation, and this bill puts it on the same ground and so did the Louisiana case—that we should pay to the Italian Government, as we did pay, and they paid to the family of the murdered man $6,000. Congress passed the bill unhesitatingly. Some of our citizens in Italy a short time ago were murdered by Italian citizens. Italy paid thirty or forty thousand dollars to the families of these American citizens. The gentleman from Louisiana will bear me out in the case I have referred to. There is no doubt about this having been the policy of the Government for years. The Secretary of State, in this very letter, says the same thing. He says:

> In view of the fact that subjects of a friendly nation were driven from the city of South Omaha, their property destroyed, and personal injuries inflicted on them, and in view of the action taken by the Government of the United States with respect to claims of this nature in the past, the Secretary of State has the honor to recommend that Congress be requested to make, as an act of grace and without reference to the question of the liability of the United States, an appropriation of $41,030—

And so forth.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will note that the recommendation was made prior to our entering the war as an ally of Greece.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As pointed out by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASH] that in the adjudication of respective claims between the governments at the close of the war, Congress might well take the position that in these war times the amount of $40,000 could far better be used in war purposes than devoted to these nationals who have suffered some insults and met with some property loss.

Mr. FLOOD. With reference to what we are going to do for Greece in this war, I hope that we will do a great deal, and that we will help her rehabilitate herself and get her in a position to help the allies win the war; but this money does not go to the Government of Greece; it is paid to that Government for the benefit of individuals.

Mr. STAFFORD. As a balm to the injured feelings of these nationals who have been driven out of South Omaha because of the failure of the local authorities there to protect them.

Mr. FLOOD. Not as a balm. It is paid to them as a right. Their property has been destroyed. They may have been violating the law. I do not know. Certainly this mass meeting of 500 South Omaha citizens violated the law, and if they thought the Greeks were violating the law they could have taken them into their criminal courts and prosecuted them and had them punished, but they should not have constituted themselves greaters violators of the law by organizing a mob and going there and driving these people out of the city and destroying their property. That was a violation of law, and the Greek nationals suffered by reason of that violation, and that is what their Government complains of—a violation of law against these Greek nationals, a violation of law that destroyed the property of these people; and we ask this appropriation to pay for this violation of our law by our citizens and to pay the people who suffered by reason of that violation. It follows the policy of our Government. Our Government has done this for years in similar cases. It did it in the case that the gentleman and myself have been discussing, notwithstanding the fact that Secretary Blaine said at one time that there was no obligation on the part of this Government. The Government does not recognize its obligation, but as a matter of international grace it pays, through these embassies and legations that are here, for the injuries done to the person and property of nationals of these various Governments who happened to be injured in this country through the illegal acts of our own people. We have established precedent for this bill. This claim is thoroughly proved. The Greek legation put in a claim for $153,000. Our Department of Justice investigated the claims, as did our State Department. They made careful investigation, and scaled the claims down to $40,000, and the Secretary of State has recommended that Congress make an appropriation of $40,000 for the purpose of paying the claims. The difference between the Greek legation and our Department of Justice and the Department of State was in respect to the amount of the claims.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman the names of the people who were injured and the amounts which go to make up the $40,000?

Mr. FLOOD. I have seen the list of the names of those people, but the gentleman complained about this claim being presented in 1918, when it is nine years old. The Greek legation has been knocking at the door of Congress for this appropriation during most of that time. This letter from the Secretary of State, which the gentleman read here, was written before this war began. It was written two years ago, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] indicates that probably the Secretary of State would not desire it to be pushed now. I want to say to him that I have had no conversation with the Secretary of State and no communication with him in reference to this claim, but there are claims in the Foreign Affairs Committee of a similar nature at the present time about which I have received letters from the Secretary of State within the last few days. He is interested in their being paid now and not waiting until the war ends. The State Department and our Government must recognize its international obligations in these matters.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does not our Government expect the same treatment from all other Governments where our own citizens are mistreated and their property destroyed in other countries?

Mr. FLOOD. Our Government expects it and demands it and receives it. I do not remember the name of the case, but in the case of the man who was killed in Florida Secretary Bryan recommended that we appropriate $6,000, and the question was raised on the floor of the House here, and it was stated that that was too much money to pay, but we produced evidence to show that just a short while before the Italian Government had paid our Government for our nationals who had been mistreated in Italy an amount between thirty and forty thousand dollars. That bill was passed without question. This measure has not been fortunate in getting before Congress sooner.

It has been reported to the House before, and either the House passed it and the Senate did not or it failed for some reason to get through the House when it got through the Senate. It has now been passed by the Senate and has a chance to pass the House, and it does not seem to me that there ought to be any question in the world about its passage. The fact that we are about to enact a tremendously large revenue bill is no reason why we should not pay our just and honest and legitimate obligations. We are passing the revenue measure to raise that enormous revenue for the purpose of paying our honest obligations, and under our international practice this is one of those obligations.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know of any claims which the United States has pending against the Governments of any of the nations with which we are associated in this war which we are now pressing?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think that I could mention any. It is not my business as a Member of Congress to keep up with those things, and I have not any in mind. But I do know that the claim I speak of was paid by the Italian Government and paid very promptly. These foreign governments with whom we have had these negotiations have paid our claims much more promptly than we have paid them. We have postponed them to a more convenient season, as the gentleman now suggests we do with this. This matter is now before Congress. If it does not pass now, no man can tell when it will be taken up again in the House. It is a just claim. The amount of it has been carefully ascertained by our Department of State, and it is due to these people under the international practice. It will be paid to these people through their legation. This money does not go to the treasury of Greece, it goes to the individuals, and because we are going to do something to help Greece in this war, and to get Greece to help us, is no reason why we should deny to individual citizens of Greece the payment of a just claim which they have against this Government. I hope the measure will pass.

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I know something personally with regard to this claim. The matter upon which it is based constitutes one of the most disgraceful episodes in the history of this country. The facts are simply indisputable. A police officer was killed in South Omaha, and thereupon a number of citizens of that place gathered in mass meeting and proceeded to organize a mob, if a mob can be called an organized body, with the purpose not of inflicting any punishment for the crime that had been committed, but with the dastardly intention of driving out, injuring, and assaulting innocent parties. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] read here the declaration of parties connected with the mob that some of those Greeks had been lawless. If any of that nationality had been guilty of crime in South Omaha, they were not the persons who were attacked. The people who were attacked were perfectly innocent, law-abiding citizens, who were carrying on a legitimate business in that city. Their stores were broken into, their property was destroyed, their persons were injured, and that some of them were not killed was not the fault of the members of the mob, because they proceeded regardless of consequences. Now, what have we done? For some eight or nine years, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has said, the Greek legation has been pressing their claims upon the State Department and knocking at the doors of this Congress asking redress for this outrage. Have we done anything? Not a thing. And why? The reason is perfectly plain; because Greece is just a little space on the map of Europe, without any power to injure us in any kind of way. If it had been one of the strong nations—if it had been England or France, or even Germany before the war—this claim would have been paid long, long ago. There is not any question about it. We have paid claims of this character time and time again, and we ought to pay them. Shall we permit it to be said that we do justice only to strong nations and wrong the weak? It is a disgrace that the claim has stood so long, and it would be still more disgraceful not to pass this bill. There is no other way by which these parties can obtain redress.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Can the gentleman state whether Nebraska has a law similar to the law we have in the State of Illinois by which when citizens are injured by a mob they can recover damages from the local government?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. My understanding is that the State of Nebraska has no such law and that it has refused to pay any damages to these parties. They might, of course, appeal to the local courts if anybody could state who constituted the mob, but there is no way of telling who composed it or placing the responsibility. They are absolutely without redress if we do not pay them at this time.

Let me mention some things further. It has been said we ought not to pay these parties because we are an ally with Greece and we are engaged in a war. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LOBECK], who is familiar with the circumstances of the case and details of it, tells me that the fathers and mothers of boys who are engaged in this war on our side—enlisted in our Army—are a part of the people to whom this money would go. And look at the casualty lists. See how many names of Greeks are among them, justifying the reputation that these people have had from ancient times as lovers of liberty and ready to fight in the cause of freedom. Shall we tell them now because they are allied with us we can not pay this money? I can not see anything in that kind of an argument, but on the contrary an additional reason why we ought to pay this claim. We have no more loyal citizens anywhere in the United States and no more patriotic nation in this war than the Greeks. Hundreds have declined to claim their exemptions which they might have urged as aliens, but on the contrary when the call has come have gone willingly, and even without the call have voluntarily enlisted in the ranks of our Army and are fighting our cause now. I insist that this claim ought to be paid. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has 15 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Massachusetts has 45 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, just a word in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN]. The question of Greek citizens being loyal or their names appearing in the casualty lists has nothing to do with the consideration of the matter before the House. That is a little sentiment dragged in here by the heels seeking to justify the payment of a claim of this nature during the war, and I will venture to say there is not a government that is associated with us in this struggle that is paying at this particular time claims of this nature for injuries to citizens of other governments that are associated with them in prosecuting this war. Why, if this is an obligation, if this is an honest moral obligation, and is to go to the citizens of this Nation—and some of those citizens have become citizens of the United States—why do not we pay the former citizens of Austria-Hungary who are now citizens of the United States? Yet they are eliminated from this bill because we are at war with Austria-Hungary, and yet if the money is to go to the citizens who are injured—and some of those men who are injured have since become citizens of the United States—why does not the obligation still exist to pay these men?

Mr. FLOOD. Who would pay them if we appropriated?

Mr. WALSH. Pay it to the citizens, that is where the gentleman says this money is to go, and yet there is not a word in the bill which says it shall be paid to these men.

Mr. FLOOD. I said it was to be paid to the legation, and the legation pays the citizens.

Mr. WALSH. There is nothing in this bill that says that it is ever to reach the pockets of these citizens.

Mr. FLOOD. It is not necessary to put it in the bill; it is a well-established national practice, and it is not necessary to put it in the bill. It has been done dozens of times.

Mr. WALSH. I am, of course, willing to take the gentleman's opinion in that respect. Now, the gentleman refers to a case down here in Florida, where some $6,000 was paid to an Italian citizen who was killed. That was before we entered this war. There has not been a claim cited or suggested where a government engaged in a common cause in the prosecution of this war has set apart any of their funds to pay claims of this nature.

And I submit that this bill here, if the claim is moral and just, and it is an obligation that is recognized by international law, should be deferred until the termination of this struggle.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. DENISON. If American citizens who happen to be living in Italy or England should be killed or their property destroyed by mobs, would the gentleman think we ought to permit those Governments to wait or acquiesce in those Governments waiting until after this war before our citizens should be compensated?

Mr. WALSH. I certainly do. If we have claims pending against Italy or against France or against England or any other of the associate nations at the present time, for injuries inflicted upon our citizens as the result of mob violence or lawlessness for which citizens of those nations are responsible, we ought not to press those claims at the present time but ought to wait until the termination of the war.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. How is the fact that a country is engaged in war going to benefit or help citizens that have been damaged?

Mr. WALSH. It is not a question of helping citizens who have been damaged. But those damages are so insignificant, international though they may be in their nature, that they ought to be put aside until the more important question is determined, and we ought not to use our funds, raised by war emergency taxation, for such claims as these. They have no proper place in the budget. I trust this measure will be defeated, though I imagine it will not be.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat surprised that any Member of the House should think we ought not to pay for damages done to Greek citizens because, forsooth, we are now on most excellent terms with the Government of Greece. These Greeks were injured in riots in South Omaha in February, 1909, and we are now asking that they be compensated for their losses. Our own Government has examined the claims presented by the Kingdom of Greece, and our State Department recommends that they be paid. It will not seem to them to be a satisfactory reply to say: "We shall not pay you Greeks anything now, because we are such good friends of your Government that we do not need to pay our debts to you." It seems to me if there is anything at all in the friendly relations between the two Governments that ought to influence our action one way or the other, we ought to pay the claims the more promptly because we are on good terms.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. If the friendliness of the nations is to be considered, and, of course, it may be an element, would not the gentleman also favor paying them the amount that the Greek legation claims and not have the temerity to scale down what they first claimed?

Mr. TEMPLE. I was protesting against allowing the friendly relations existing between the two Governments to have any weight in considering this matter at all. The gentleman says, on the other hand, that we ought not to pay it now, because our friendship is sufficient compensation. Oh, I know he did not use just that language.

I happened to be on the subcommittee of the Foreign Affairs Committee that had this case under consideration. We went into all the available evidence. I have forgotten a good deal of it, as it has been a long time ago. But I remember very distinctly my impression that the obligation ought to be paid just as promptly as possible. There is absolutely nothing in the whole case that is not entirely regular. This is the way the situation is met ordinarily. If these Greeks had been naturalized American citizens at the time, of course the Greek Government would not then have claimed any payment for them.

I remember a somewhat witty remark that may not be particularly welcome to us as citizens of the United States. A number of years ago a complaint was made to one of the ministers of a foreign country living in Washington when one of the nationals of his Government had been hanged by a mob. The minister refused to take up the case, saying to the complainant that, having investigated the incident, he had learned that the former subject of his Government had been duly naturalized and was entitled to all the privileges of American citizenship. The Greeks for whom this claim is presented were not naturalized American citizens, but were living here under treaty rights which guaranteed to them the full protection of our laws. It seems to me that if we wish our credit to stand well with our friends we certainly ought not to delay longer the payment of this obligation.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I think the claim ought to be paid, and that the bill ought to pass; but I want to ask the gentleman a question, inasmuch as I know he is quite an authority on these matters. Has it ever been attempted, or has the custom ever prevailed anywhere, of the Government attempting to recoup itself from the State or local governments?

Mr. TEMPLE. That is purely a matter of domestic law. The State of Nebraska is not known at all to the Government of Greece.

Mr. DENISON. I am talking about this Government recouping after paying these damages.

Mr. TEMPLE. That is not involved in this bill.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman know of that ever being attempted or followed by the Government?

Mr. TEMPLE. I do not recall any such instance.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman thing that if the payment of this is deferred it will affect our friendliness or the friendly relations existing between the Government of Greece and our Government?

Mr. TEMPLE. I do not know that it will have any effect at all on them.

Mr. WALSH. But the gentleman does think if it is not paid promptly—that is, if this bill does not pass—it will affect our credit as a nation?

Mr. TEMPLE. It ought to affect our own opinion of ourselves. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further general debate the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as a matter of grace and without reference to the question of liability therefor, to the Government of Greece, as full indemnity on account of injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots which occurred in South Omaha, Nebr., on February 21, 1909, as set forth in the message of the President of the United States dated January 14, 1916, $40,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the Senate bill.

Mr. FLOOD. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it be passed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMALL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 4527) to authorize the payment of indemnities to the Government of Greece for injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots occurring in South Omaha, Nebr., February 21, 1909, had directed him to report it back with the recommendation that it be passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee, having had under consideration Senate bill 4527, had directed him to report it back with a favorable recommendation. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 2.

So the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, House bill 69, of similar tenor, will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on Foreign Affairs any other bill?

Mr. FLOOD. No.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next committee.

The Clerk called the Committee on Military Affairs.

BOARD OF MANAGERS, NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to call up House joint resolution 289.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 289) for the appointment of four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Resolved, etc., That George H. Wood, of Ohio; James C. Catherwood, of Illinois; John C. Nelson, of Indiana; and Menander Dennett, of Maine, be, and they are hereby, appointed members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States, to succeed George H. Wood, of Ohio; James C. Catherwood, of Illinois; John C. Nelson, of Indiana; and John W. West, of Maine, whose terms of office expired April 21, 1918.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution to reappoint the managers of the Soldiers' Home. As nominated in the resolution, the only new name that is offered is that of Menander Dennett for John W. West, of Maine, and that is made necessary because Mr. West has died. This name is offered in lieu of Mr. West's.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Did the gentleman state that Mr. West had died?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Since he resigned?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; so I have been informed. He first offered his resignation because of failing health, and has since died.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have one amendment that I wish to offer. In lieu of the name of George H. Wood, on page 1, line 3, insert the name of M. T. Dwyer.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the name of "George H. Wood" and insert in lieu thereof the name of "M. T. Dwyer."

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, the reason for that is that Gen. Wood has, since his term of office expired and this bill was introduced, which was at the beginning of this session, been appointed to a commission in the Army and is now serving in France. The name of Mr. Dwyer is offered for that reason. Gen. Wood has gone to France.

The SPEAKER. How does the gentleman spell that name?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is spelled "Dwyer." He is a soldier.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the committee taken action on the substitution of Mr. Dwyer's name for Gen. Wood's?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Not as a committee, but the members of the committee who were present have all agreed to the substitution of Mr. Dwyer's name for that of Mr. Wood.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, I have no desire to oppose the substitution of Mr. Dwyer's name for Mr. Wood's in view of the fact that Mr. Wood is absent from the country in the service of the Army, but I wish to offer an amendment to substitute another name for that of another. However, I will wait the action of the House on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Shallenberger amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out, in lines 4 and 5, "Menander Dennett, of Maine," and substitute the name of "Henry Hase, of Wisconsin."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Strike out, on page 1, lines 4 and 5, the words "Menander Dennett, of Maine," and insert in lieu thereof the words "Henry Hase, of Wisconsin."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, some years ago—about five, as I recall—an attempt was made to curtail the membership of the Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Home. At that time Wisconsin, by reason of having one of the largest branch homes within the State, had a representative, but as the result of the elimination process, and the only case where the elimination process acted, the representative from Wisconsin was stricken off and the membership of this board of managers was reduced. Wisconsin has one of the largest of these branch homes in the country. It houses nearly 2,000 old soldiers. The home is located in the environs of Milwaukee, not in my district, but in that represented by my colleague.

Mr. Henry Hase, whose name I have proposed as a substitute for that of Mr. Menander Dennett, is a veteran of the Civil War. I may say that he is a Democrat in politics. He has three sons, one of whom is a major of artillery at the present time and for along time in the service of his country. That son volunteered in the Philippine war. He rose from the ranks and continued in the Regular Army until to-day he is one of the recognized authorities on matters of artillery. He has other sons who are giving their best in the interest of the Government.

I do not wish to provoke any contest between the home in Maine and the home in the Northwest, and yet anyone who has studied the statistics about the respective homes knows that the home in Maine has only a very few members as compared to that at Milwaukee, perhaps one-fifth as many. We ought to have a representative from Wisconsin to look after the branch home there. As Mr. Hase's friends wrote me some time ago when this matter was under consideration, I take the liberty now of presenting his name and to have Wisconsin placed on the list where she should be to-day in the membership of this board, and of which she was deprived by a lottery when an attempt was made to reduce the membership of the board.

Mr. DEWALT. Was Mr. Hase on the board before?

Mr. STAFFORD. No.

Mr. HERSEY. I would like to inquire if the other members of the board are not all from the West except the one from Maine?

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe not. I believe there is a representative from the East. I will give the gentleman the membership from the Congressional Directory.

Mr. HERSEY. I am speaking of those mentioned as nominees.

Mr. RAKER. Where are these men from?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. One from Ohio, one from Illinois, and one from Indiana.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will give the House all the information I possess so that they may act intelligently on the matter. As disclosed by the Congressional Directory the managers at present are Gen. George H. Wood, president, headquarters Dayton, Ohio; Capt. John C. Nelson, Logansport, Ind.; Maj. James W. Wadsworth, Geneseo, N. Y. Maj. Wadsworth is a former Member of this House of Representatives and has an illustrious war record. The other members are Mr. James S. Catherwood, of Illinois; Col. Markham, of California; Mr. West, of Lewiston, Me.; and Mr. Black, of Kansas. Mr. Dennett has been recommended to succeed Mr. West.

As I have stated, Wisconsin ought to have its representative. It was purposed to reduce this board, I believe, to five, the number at that time being nine; but the law was repealed, and now I am only asking the membership of the House to place Wisconsin back where she was before that effort was made to reduce the membership of the board.

Mr. HERSEY. The gentleman's only reason is that the Wisconsin home is larger than the Maine home?

Mr. STAFFORD. My reason is that the enrollment at the Wisconsin home is nearly five or six times that of the Maine home. The Wisconsin institution is a live one, whereas the Maine home is dwindling and becoming less and less, and it is necessary and more important for the welfare of the homes to have a representative from the State, so as to give attention to the homes which have a large membership.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 14, noes 8.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] if the name "James C. Catherwood" should not be "James S. Catherwood." I notice in the Congressional Directory it is James S. Catherwood, and that is my recollection of his name.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. All I can say is that the name "James C. Catherwood" was handed to me by the members of the board who were interested in the passage of this bill.

Mr. FOSTER. My understanding has always been that his name is James S. Catherwood, and I think it ought to be changed.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will offer an amendment changing the name "James C. Catherwood" to "James S. Catherwood."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the initial "C" in the name "James C. Catherwood" and insert the letter "S."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the same amendment will be made in line 8.

There was no objection.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHALLENBERGER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there any further business from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No further business.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next committee.

The Clerk called the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with further Calendar Wednesday business and to consider the Unanimous Consent Calendar for the remainder of the day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business for the remainder of the day. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to object.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum. Evidently there is none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, August 22, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12731) amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 759), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ANDERSON: A bill (H. R. 12797) granting an increase of pension to Martin McDermott; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FIELDS: A bill (H. R. 12798) granting an increase of pension to William M. Blankenship; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PURNELL: A bill (H. R. 12799) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin F. Kernodle; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12800) granting an increase of pension to James M. Spencer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 321) tendering public acknowledgment of gratitude to the Army and Navy of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BACHARACH: Petition of J. P. Reeves, of Bridgeton, N. J., concerning war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan: Petition of Elmer Vaughen and 69 other citizens of Waldron, Mich., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TILSON: Petition of Rev. G. Whitefield and 100 others of Milford, Conn., favoring war prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 22, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we have been called together to consider mighty issues of this troublous time. We bless Thee that Thou hast called together the heart and spirit of a great Nation back of the Senate, that the Nation is delivering itself through all its avenues of personal expression in the interest of the high ideals for which we have ever stood, and that in addressing ourselves to the task of this day we may do it with a clear conscience and with a sense of the backing and encouragement and sympathy of a great Nation.

We seek Thy blessing upon us, O God, that we may do all things according to Thy will, that our vision may be clear not only of the duties of the day but of the glorious opportunities that are before us to spread the ideals of peace and righteousness in all the earth.

We pray Thy blessing upon our soldiers and sailors and upon all who are in places of danger, that Thou wilt shelter them from harm and give them a speedy victory over our enemy. Grant us this day Thy grace. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, August 19, 1918, when, on request of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

LIST OF CLAIMS (S. DOC. NO. 273).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting, pursuant to an order of the court, a list of cases referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication by a resolution of the Senate of March 3, 1887, commonly known as the Tucker Act, which cases were dismissed by the court June 17, 1918, on motion of the defendants under section 5 of the act of March 4, 1915; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

RATIFICATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the executive of the State of Louisiana, transmitting resolutions adopted by the legislature of that State ratifying the proposed prohibition amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The communication and accompanying resolutions will be placed on the files of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4527) to authorize the payment of indemnities to the Government of Greece for injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots occurring in South Omaha, Nebr., February 21, 1909.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 12704. An act to authorize the importation without the payment of duty of sundry articles for the American National Red Cross to be donated or used by it solely to or for the benefit of the land or naval forces of the United States or its allies, or for the relief of the civilian population of the United States or of its allies; and

H. J. Res. 289. Joint resolution for the appointment of four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The message further transmitted to the Senate resolutions on the death of Hon. JACOB HAROLD GALLINGER, late a Senator from the State of New Hampshire.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KENYON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Iowa, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I present a communication consisting of a letter addressed to myself and a series of resolutions of Millmen's Union No. 338, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America of Seattle, Wash. These resolutions and communication are in response to a letter addressed to organized labor July 13, 1918, by the general financial secretary of the International Union of United Brewery and Soft Drink Workers of America. In opposition to the principles stated in that letter the carpenters and joiners' union of Seattle, Wash., point out the benefits which have accrued to union labor and to the people of that State from prohibition as it now exists there, in opposition to the view expressed in the brewery workers' communication referred to. I ask that it be properly referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions and communication will lie on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a resolution adopted at a mass meeting of citizens held in Royal Park, Miami, Fla., favoring the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Clearwater, Fla., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. REED. I present a memorial signed by a large number of citizens of the State of Missouri touching upon the question of the proposed prohibition amendment. I ask that the memorial be received and appropriately referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will lie on the table.

Mr. HALE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KNOX presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FERNALD presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, and Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prohibit the manufacture and sale of beer and wines, which was ordered to lie on the table.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I present petitions of citizens of Colorado to the Senate of the United States relative to the passage of the woman-suffrage amendment to the Constitution. These petitions resulted from the action of the Denver Post, the largest daily newspaper in Denver, in advocating in some strong editorials the amendment, in placing in its columns a short form of petition, and asking the people who were interested to sign it and transmit it to the Denver Post. That has been done, and the signers constitute several thousand names in favor of the petition. No solicitors sought to procure the signatures. The petitions were signed by those readers of the paper who took the trouble to cut it out, sign the same with their address, and mail it to the Denver Post. It consists of only 10 or 12 lines, and I desire to read it:

PETITION TO SENATE FOR WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE.

Petition to the Senate to support the President of the United States and pass a suffrage amendment in accordance with the request of the President of the United States.

To the Senate of the United States:

The President says that the suffrage amendment should be passed as a just recognition of the work American women have done for the support of the war. We agree with the President.

The President says that this suffrage amendment is a necessary war measure; that it will help win the war.

Senators, that alone is surely reason enough why you should vote for the amendment.

Senators, your petitioners urge you to stand by the President and to heed his advice and to vote for the suffrage amendment, both as a war measure that will help us to win victory sooner and as an act of high justice to the patriotic women of the United States.

I ask that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, while we are on this subject I wish to present a letter of Mrs. Ida Husted Harper, of August 14, addressed to myself, and which I will read to the Senate so that it will appear in the RECORD in conjunction with the other items that have been offered. I will read only that part of it which refers to the so-called National Woman's Party:

I wonder if you are familiar with the history of this small organization. Its leaders, Miss Alice Paul and Miss Lucy Burns, while studying in England, joined Mrs. Pankhurst's organization and were among those who were put into prison. They returned to the United States in 1912 with the intention of starting a "militant" movement here, but the idea being coldly received they proposed to the National Association that they should organize a suffrage parade in Washington similar to those that had been held in London. They were appointed a committee to do this and also to assist the work for the Federal amendment, whose prospects had been advanced by the recent victories in Oregon, Arizona, and Kansas. While working here they conceived the idea of forming a rival organization which should do more aggressive work with Congress and cut out all State campaigns. They used the association's letterheads for this purpose, and as soon as its officers learned what was being done they were removed from the committee and thereafter devoted themselves to building up their own organization.

In 1914, as you know, they adopted Mrs. Pankhurst's policy of "fighting the party in power," and went into the equal-suffrage States to organize the voters against the Democratic candidates for Congress. Their action was strongly repudiated by the National Association, which always had been absolutely nonpartisan. In 1916 they changed their name from the Congressional Union to the National Woman's Party, thus confusing the mind of the public still more as to the identity of the two organizations. They worked against the Democratic candidates throughout this campaign also, and it would have been practically impossible for the National Association to retain the friendship of the Democratic Party had it not been for the election of President Wilson by the vote of the equal-suffrage States.

In 1917, because President Wilson had been thus elected, the leaders of the National Association saw an opportunity to carry out their long-cherished plan of securing for women a vote for presidential electors in various States, and had bills introduced in their legislatures for this purpose. The Congressional Union having again lost its fight against the Democratic Party, and fearing that it might disappear from the spot light, conceived the idea of "picketing" the White House. I need not enter into that unfortunate action further than to say that it contributed largely to the defeat of the suffrage amendment in Maine that autumn and came very near losing it in the State of New York. It required a year of effort by the officers of the National Association and its press bureau to convince the public that this small group did not represent the great body of suffragists.

This so-called National Woman's Party is less than five years old, and nobody has the slightest idea as to the size of its membership. Anyone who ever gave it 25 cents is enrolled as a member forever. It goes into a State, holds a meeting, appoints a committee, and then announces that it has organized the State. It assures the women that the National Association is working only for State amendments and that it alone is working for a Federal amendment.

The National American Suffrage Association was founded in 1869 by Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, and other pioneers for the express purpose of obtaining a Federal amendment and never has ceased in its efforts. It took up State work only because it saw that Congress would not act until the experiment had been made in a number of States. Every State is auxiliary to this association, which has an estimated membership of 2,000,000, and its work has always been constitutional, legal, conservative, and dignified. Every particle of suffrage which the women of the United States possess to-day has been gained under the auspices of its State branches. It enjoys the full confidence of the Administration, and, we trust, of Congress, and we earnestly hope that its efforts of nearly 60 years will not be thwarted by this small body of irresponsible women.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, having received this frank opinion by the National American Woman's Suffrage Association of the National Woman's Party, it will now be in order to await an equally frank opinion of the National American Woman's Suffrage Association by the National Woman's Party.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 4871) to authorize the Philadelphia, Harrisburg & Pittsburgh Railroad Co., its lessees, successors, and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Susquehanna River from the city of Harrisburg, Dauphin County, Pa., to the borough of Lemoyne, Cumberland County, Pa.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 4872) to incorporate the United Lutheran Church in America; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 4873) for the relief of Calvin Willard Gilfillan; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have been requested to introduce a bill, which I now do. The object seems to be a most worthy one. Its form is not entirely perfect, but I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 4874) to establish a national conservatory of music and art for the education of advanced pupils in music in all its branches, vocal and instrumental (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 4875) granting an increase of pension to Jacob Brown (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4876) granting an increase of pension to Samuel McCord (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 4877) for the relief of Mary Wait (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims; and

A bill (S. 4878) granting a pension to Sarah M. Geiger; to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a bill to be referred to the Committee on Finance. It is a bill providing for the raising of revenue by means of a tax on sales. I desire to say in the introduction of this bill that it was prepared by a citizen of my State, Mr. C. A. Mariani. It is not, therefore, original with the introducer of the measure, but I introduce it and send it to the committee because I think it is well worthy of their consideration.

By Mr. BORAH:

A bill (S. 4879) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. MARTIN:

A bill (S. 4880) granting an increase of pension to Cornelia A. Nickels (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

CHANGES OF DRAFT AGE.

Mr. CUMMINS submitted five amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4856) to amend sections 2, 4, and 5 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. GORE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4856) to amend sections 2, 4, and 5 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. KIRBY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4856) to amend sections 2, 4, and 5 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. FRANCE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4856) to amend sections 2, 4, and 5 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR GALLINGER.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 292), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the President pro tempore in arranging for and attending the funeral of the Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER, late a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

MOB VIOLENCE (S. DOC. NO. 272).

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed as a public document the letter of the President of July 26 last, denouncing mob violence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMERICA'S UNGUARDED GATEWAY.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, in the August number of the North American Review a letter was published which was unquestionably a reflection upon the State of New Mexico. The author of the article I do not know, but inasmuch as it was published in a periodical which has considerable circulation throughout the country it seems to me that it ought not to go unnoticed.

My colleague [Mr. FALL] addressed a letter to the editor of that periodical condemning its publication, and in response to that letter the editor has published in the War Weekly a general and unqualified apology.

The Representative from New Mexico in the House, on Tuesday of this week, delivered some very fitting remarks concerning the publication. I do not, therefore, deem it wise to make any extended remarks of my own concerning it at this time.

The people of Dona Ana County, in New Mexico, in mass meeting assembled on the 8th of August, passed resolutions which are so expressive of what I feel to be the universal sentiment of the people of New Mexico, and which in very strong and effective terms declare the conditions as they exist in New Mexico and the untruthfulness of the charges made, that I think it advisable that those resolutions should be printed in the RECORD.

I therefore request that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FALL. My colleague has requested the publication of what resolutions?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the people of Dona Ana County August 8.

Mr. FALL. I have no objection at all to the publication.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by a mass meeting of patriotic citizens held at the armory in Las Cruces, Dona Ana County, N. Mex., on August 8, 1918, held to consider an article in the North American Review for August, 1918.

Whereas there was published in the August number of the North American Review an article headed "America's unguarded gateway" (p. 312); and

Whereas said article is composed of a tissue of lies from the first line to the last; and

Whereas no respectable journal would publish such an attack upon the entire people of an American Commonwealth without investigation and justification therefor: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the citizens of New Mexico, most highly resent this unjustifiable attack upon the honor, virtue, and loyalty of our people; and

Resolved, That we brand as unqualifiedly false the statements contained in said article to the effect that a Mexican, a German, or any other hostile army, could march unmolested and welcomed through our State; that our people are anything but profoundly devoted to the American flag; that the use of Spanish when necessary for the proceedings of court, legislature, or other assemblies constitutes any just reflection upon the loyalty of the people; that there is any secret or other organization that improperly influences the courts, legislature, election machinery, local administration, or any other element of public or private life; that the United States Government or any of its departments have wrongfully deprived any of our citizens of their rights or improperly extended any of their privileges.

And most emphatically do we resent and qualify as maliciously false and libelous the statement that "a state of treason exists in this part of our country" and the statement that "the native population awaits the hour to strike."

And in refutation of the said infamous statements and of the many others with which said article abounds, we submit:

(1) That New Mexico is blessed with as loyal and true a body of citizens as any other State of our beloved country.

(2) That never since New Mexico became a part of the Nation has any act of disloyalty been shown by its people toward the Government, but, on the contrary, in the Civil War, the Spanish War, and in every crisis of the country our State and her native sons have shown in potent and convincing deeds that their Americanism is as pure as that of any other State in the Union.

(3) That if the other States of the Union had furnished in the present war as large percentage of troops, volunteer and selective, as New Mexico, the United States Army would to-day be practically doubled in number.

(4) That Dona Ana County, which is a border county, and which, according to the article referred to constitutes the very gateway for a hostile army, was the first county in the United States to go over the top in the last Red Cross drive and exceeded its quota three times over.

(5) That New Mexico in every civil activity of the war has far exceeded its quota and has exceeded the average attained throughout the country.

(6) That the women of the State have been commended in their Red Cross work by the highest officials of the Red Cross for the activity and faithfulness of their patriotic services.

(7) That the farmers of New Mexico, impelled by the war emergency, have almost doubled the agricultural production in two years, and every essential war industry has been augmented to the limit.

(8) That no call of the Government in behalf of the great national enterprise has been met with any but the most self-sacrificing patriotic response.

(9) That the sentiment of our people, including distinctly the so-called Spanish-Americans, is characterized by the cheerful, willing service of our sons who have gone forth to war, and that sentiment is personified in the history of Capt. Joseph Quesenberry, Eighteenth United States Infantry, heroic son of this county, who captured the first German prisoners and guns taken by an American force in France; cited for bravery on the field by Gen. Bullard, his division commander, and by Gen. Pershing, the American commander; and who, in a few short days later, paid the supreme price and laid down his gallant sword and his young life for his country's cause: Now, therefore, be it further

Resolved, That in the light of these facts it is not strange that New Mexico arises as one man and challenges in unmeasured condemnation the brutal, degrading aspersions cast upon the integrity of our people, and we register our contempt for the disordered mind that conceived and the ill-advised publication that gives currency to such infamy; and be it further

Resolved, That the chairman and secretary of this meeting be instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to the New Mexico State Council of Defense, with the request that if possible legal action, both criminal and civil, or either, be instituted against the person and the publication responsible for the vile and malicious slander upon the good name of a loyal people, who form a substantial portion of the Nation, and who, as an integral part thereof, are entitled to the same protection as the Government itself against such seditious utterances; and further

Resolved, That the press of the State and the North American Review be furnished with a copy hereof for publication, and that the North American Review be requested to make editorial repudiation and retraction of the article, and that they be brought to the attention of the United States attorney for New Mexico, as well as the National Committee on Public Information, with the request that appropriate legal or other action be taken, and that widespread refutation be made, and that a committee of five be appointed by the chairman to follow up vigorously this and any other similarly unwarranted attacks.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER SUTHERLAND, Chairman.

Attest:

JOSE GONZALES, Secretary.

APPRECIATION OF THE LATE SENATOR TILLMAN.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I present a resolution of the Alaska Bureau of the Chamber of Commerce and Commercial Club of the city of Seattle, which resolution was also concurred in by the Chamber of Commerce and the Commercial Club itself. It is an expression of appreciation for the services to the north Pacific coast of Hon. B. R. TILLMAN, late a Senator from South Carolina. It is a brief and appropriate and sincere expression of appreciation of the responsive interest which the late Senator always took in matters relating to the north Pacific coast, particularly in connection with the Navy. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEATTLE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AND COMMERCIAL CLUB.

Resolution commemorative of the late Hon. B. R. TILLMAN.

In the passing of the Hon. B. R. TILLMAN, chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, Alaska has lost a true friend. Advised as to the potential wealth of Alaska's undeveloped resources, he labored for a rational development that would make for the welfare of her people. A statesman of broad vision, he realized that the extremes of governmental policy toward the opening of Alaska's resources tended to economic loss and waste, instead of utilization and conservation.

For the use of Alaska coal to supply the needs of the Navy on the Pacific, Senator TILLMAN was an earnest and active worker, who exerted a strong influence in bringing about this nationally desired result.

In behalf of the friends of Alaska the Alaska Bureau of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce and Commercial Club expresses its sincere grief in the national loss of a champion whose every effort was for the welfare and advancement of mankind.

Adopted by the Alaska Bureau, Seattle Chamber of Commerce and Commercial Club July 30, 1918.

J. L. MCPHERSON, Secretary.

Adopted by the trustees of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce and Commercial Club August 6, 1918.

G. C. CORBALEY,
Executive Secretary.

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION.

Mr. THOMAS. From the Committee on Military Affairs I present a report (No. 555) upon aviation production in the United States, and in this connection also offer a letter and telegram from Mr. Howard E. Coffin, at one time the chairman of the Aircraft Board, which was sent to me as chairman of the subcommittee, during our investigation. I am also instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to request that the report now presented be read to the Senate in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the report. The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report. During the reading of the report,

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the reading of this report does not seem to command the presence of the Senate I ask that its further reading be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the report be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the report will be printed in full in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 555, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION IN THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report pursuant to Senate resolution 48:

The Committee on Military Affairs, who were directed by a Senate resolution adopted April 30, 1917, to investigate aircraft production in the United States, have completed that duty and report as follows:

On April 6, 1917, the United States entered the war.

On June 8, 1917, public announcement was made that a great fleet of 25,000 aeroplanes was about to be created, and would be decisive of the war months before an effective army could be put in Europe.

July 24, 1917, Congress appropriated $640,000,000 to carry out the aircraft program. This fund has been, either by actual expenditure or by commitments, exhausted. A further appropriation of $884,304,758 has been found necessary.

In the opinion of the committee a substantial part of the first appropriation was practically wasted.

While much good work has been accomplished, for which due credit should be given, it must nevertheless be admitted that our aeroplane program has, up to the present, presented many aspects of failure. To some of these we call attention:

While an army of three and one-half million has been raised, the aircraft situation is as follows:

(a) Six hundred and one De Haviland 4's have been embarked for France up to August 1, 1918.

Of these, 67 had reached the front by July 1.

On August 7 a squadron of 18 De Haviland 4's flew over the German lines. Details of its performance have not been received. The character and construction of the De Haviland 4 is further discussed in paragraph (i) and in the body of this report.

(b) We have not a single American-made Chasse (or plane of attack) upon the battle front.

(c) We have not a single American-made heavy bombing plane upon the battle front.

(d) We have not developed and put in quantity production a successful Chasse, or fighting plane.

(e) Our attempt to create a fighting plane was centered in an attempt to adapt the Bristol Fighter and De Haviland to the Liberty motor. The Bristol was, without sufficient tests, put in quantity production, over $6,500,000 expended, and the lives of several gallant men sacrificed, when the machine was condemned and its manufacture discontinued.

(f) The Standard J training machine was equipped with the Hall-Scott engine and put in quantity production. After more than 1,200 had been manufactured, at a cost of $6,000,000, the machine thus equipped was condemned as dangerous and placed in storage.

(g) The Spad is a Chasse, or fighting plane, of the highest type. Early in September an oral order was given to the Curtiss Aircraft Co. for the manufacture of 3,000 of these machines. Work was at once begun and drawings practically completed.

(h) On September 27, 1917, Col. Clark and Maj. Vincent (one of the inventors of the Liberty motor) concluded that the machine could not be operated with a Liberty motor.

On October 8 the contract was canceled, the reason given being that the single-seat fighter was regarded as obsolete. But the fact is that on April 23, 1918, a contract was let to the Curtiss Co. to build 1,000 single-seat fighters, known as the S. E. 5, which is the English equivalent of the French Spad.

In addition to this, our Government is now using upon the battle front every Spad machine it can secure from the French, but has only been able to obtain about 418 of them.

(i) The cancellation of the Spad contract and the failure of the Bristol left us without either a single or a two seat fighter, except the De Haviland 4, which was originally designed as a two-seat fighter and which we are equipping for reconnaissance, photographic, bombing, and fighting purposes.

(j) Contracts for 8,500 were let at various times. Up to August 1, 1,000 had been delivered, and a number forwarded to Gen. Pershing. An inspection and test developed numerous mistakes, both in design and workmanship. Work upon the planes was stopped until the defects could be remedied. In part this appears to have been accomplished in the field, for a squadron of 18 planes has been sent across the German lines.

(k) As early as the month of October, 1917, we were in possession of the necessary facilities to construct the Caproni, a powerful and successful heavy bombing plane, approved both by Italian and English aeronautical engineers.

Expert Italian engineers have been upon the ground since the month of January, yet the fact remains that we have up to date constructed only one experimental machine which is equipped with Liberty motors.

Nearly a year has elapsed since we might have begun work upon these machines and by this time have been in quantity production.

(l) The Handley-Page heavy bombing machine furnishes another example of delay. Plans were furnished the Signal Corps in the summer of 1917, but were not then availed of. Contracts for spare parts were not made until February, 1918. Deliveries of these spare parts did not begin until August, 1918. A sample plane ordered in March, 1918, was flown last July. Tests are not yet complete.

In the opinion of the committee the disappointing results above set forth are chiefly due to three causes:

I. That the airplane program was largely placed in the control of great automobile and other manufacturers, who were ignorant of aeronautical problems.

II. These manufacturers undertook the impossible task of creating a motor which could be adapted to all classes of flying craft. It is not too much to say that our airplane program has been largely subordinated to the Liberty motor.

III. We failed at the beginning of the war to adopt the commonsense course of reproducing the most approved types of European machines in as great numbers as possible. This should have been carried on coincident with the production of the Liberty motor. This sound policy has very recently, but after a lamentable lapse of time, been adopted.

The mistakes and errors referred to would probably have been largely avoided if the aircraft program had been under the control of one man, assisted by skilled aeronautical engineers and practical flyers to design and test our machines, with production made subordinate to them.

This brief summary is not to be taken as a wholesale condemnation of our aircraft program. Much has been accomplished. The committee is glad to report that while it believes there are yet many things to be remedied, nevertheless we are approaching a period when quantity production of planes may soon be hoped for.

The committee further reports in detail:

Beginning on May 29, your committee, instructed to inquire into the causes of delay in aircraft production, visited a number of training and testing fields and manufacturing plants in different sections of the country. It has since examined many witnesses, comprising manufacturers, fliers, officers, inspectors, and men more or less familiar with the subject and interested in the solution of its problems. The committee has not exhausted all sources of information, to do which would require the remainder of the session, but it received statements and heard testimony upon many features of the question. No attempt has been made to investigate charges of personal dishonesty or official corruption. That subject more properly belongs to the Department of Justice, which, under the direction of Hon. Charles E. Hughes, has been conducting an inquiry of its own regarding that and other phases of the subject.

In directing attention to conditions, both past and present, in the aircraft administration, your committee realizes that it is easier to criticize than to construct, and that due allowance should be made for mistakes of judgment, which are unavoidable in the organization of a new branch of the service, involving the establishment of an extensive industry. Our inquiry has been as impersonal as these conditions have permitted, and it is in the same spirit that this report is made.

THE AIRCRAFT BOARD.

As originally composed, representatives of the automobile industry featured this organization, presumably due to the theory that aircraft engine and plane production were analogous pursuits. The latter was therefore submitted to the custody of men skilled in automobile production. A board thus equipped naturally depended upon motor-car engineers and manufacturers for the solution of aviation problems. But the analogy between the two pursuits virtually begins and ends with the fact that each uses a gas-explosive motor. Hence difficulties in design and production would tend to increase until such conditions were recognized. This fact must have been demonstrated to the board through its initial experiences, for Maj. Downey states that in the beginning the board wanted much authority with little responsibility.

"They wanted the Signal Corps to execute contracts and stand back of them, the board to be in an advisory capacity, and still control the situation."

Later—

"They saw the crash coming; the board passed a resolution reaffirming the fact that they were only acting in an advisory capacity."

Organization under the Aircraft Board was unsystematic and ineffective. The chief officer of the Signal Corps was the nominal head, under whose ostensible supervision bureaus of engineering, equipment, supplies, lubrication, production, etc., were established, many of whose functions ill defined, conflicted with, or overlapped each other. Contractors, inventors, material men, everyone having business with this arm of the service and directed from one official to the other could not well transact their business and secure results with directness and efficiency. While this condition seems to be inseparable from official business routine in Washington, it featured largely in aviation from the start, materially hindering production on the one hand and diffusing responsibility therefor upon the other. Fairness, however, requires the statement that the assignment by Congress of aircraft production and administration with the Signal Corps was unfortunate. The primary needs and importance of that corps as then defined were fully equal to the experience and efficiency of its commanding officer.

AIRCRAFT PROGRAM.

When Italy entered the war she made a careful study of aerial warfare upon the French front as then developed. Her engineers then selected the most efficient types of French flying planes and immediately put them into production under the supervision of skilled French artificers. Coincident with this policy she began the development of airplanes on her own account. Her armies were, therefore, rapidly equipped with an excellent service, afterwards supplemented by machines equally effective, but of Italian design and driven by Italian motors. By this means she avoided delay in production. She also promoted the development of her engineering genius by employing it under practical conditions upon the front with the best machines that France had produced.

Your committee does not understand why the Aircraft Board did not adopt this obviously essential policy. The Signal Corps dispatched a commission to the front, headed by Col. Bolling, instructed to secure all needed information, evidently for that purpose. Col. V. E. Clarke, the aeronautical engineer of the commission, made an elaborate report, having Col. Bolling's approval, recommending the production of three English, two French, and one Italian plane, but the report was not heeded. Designs for these and other types were placed by the allied Governments, or by the inventors themselves, at the board's disposal, with assurances of expert aid to their vigorous construction.

An ostensible reason assigned for the board's inaction was the difficulty of translating metrical into linear measurements, and of obtaining quantity production of foreign motors. But the tardy acceptance and manufacture of some of the models and designs revealed the imaginary character of this objection. The board took some of the planes placed at its disposal and attempted with ill success to materially change them for American production. The general purpose of the changes seems to have been designed to adapt them to the Liberty motor, but this normal action should have been paralleled by their manufacture, both as to plane and engine, in strict accord with the plans as submitted.

Ultimately, and in the autumn of 1917, the board adopted one French and two English types of fighting planes to carry the Liberty engine. These were the Spad, the Bristol, and the De Haviland 4. Col. Clarke was instructed to redesign the Bristol upon the English model, retaining its wing load of about 7.1 pounds in a total weight of 2,937 pounds.

Hundreds of changes afterwards made in this design by Signal Corps and production engineers without consulting Col. Clarke increased the wing load to about 9.2 pounds per foot, with an approximate weight of 3,700 pounds. Some of these changes were required by this increased strain of the heavier and stronger motor upon the structure. The machine was finally put into production and then abandoned after the test of July last, and after an expenditure of more than $6,500,000 and the loss of several valuable lives.

The overload placed too great a strain upon the wings, and this, with bad construction, compelled the board to stop production. The money loss may be partly recovered by salvage. The loss of life and of months of precious time through the need of substituting another type of plane for the Bristol and then producing it are matters of far more serious concern.

In September, 1917, the Signal Corps contracted with the Curtiss Co. for 3,000 one-seater Spad planes. This is an excellent French biplane, then and now in use on the front. In October the contract was canceled, the reason given therefor being that it was done at the direction of Gen. Pershing. Inasmuch, however, as Gen. Pershing's cablegram concerning the subject bears the date of December 14 following, we must accept the statement of the Curtiss Co.'s officials that the board canceled the contract because it desired to equip the plane only with the Liberty eight-cylinder motor, which was found impracticable. The Liberty 8 was about that time discarded.

The plane was too light for the Liberty engine, so its production was suspended. The French use the Hispano-Suiza motor with this plane, and the Curtiss people assure us that their contract would long ago have been completed and the planes in the service at the front had the manufacturers been permitted to proceed with production. No attempt was thereafter made to manufacture single-seater fighters, ostensibly because of the Pershing cablegram, until May last, when Mr. Ryan placed an order with the same company for 1,000 SE–5 planes. This is substantially the English equivalent of the Spad and will probably be in production during the coming autumn. It is manifest that if the manufacture of the SE–5 is proper at this time, then the discontinuance of the manufacture of the Spad was a mistake, regardless of who is responsible therefor.

The plans for the Caproni and the Handley-Page bombing machines were available to the board soon after our entry into the war.

Early in the summer of 1917 the Standard Aircraft Co. was instructed to hold their plant at Elizabeth, N. J., in readiness to build Caproni planes.

About September 15, a verbal contract was made with the Curtiss Co., formally confirmed on October 8, 1917, to build 500 Caproni planes. This contract was never carried out, because no information was furnished to the Curtiss Co., although they repeatedly endeavored to secure the same. Afterwards it was canceled, and contract for the Bristol Fighter was substituted.

As early as October, 1917, at an international conference in Paris concerning a general aviation program, the Italian inventor, Caproni, was summoned to meet Col. Bolling, one of the heads of the aviation section in Paris. An arrangement was ultimately made by which Capt. D'Annunzio and a force of workmen and engineers were to be brought to America to produce in American plants Caproni machines. Capt. D'Annunzio and 19 of the best men of the Italian factory arrived in the United States on January 17.

In January, 1918, the Standard Co. was given a verbal order for 1,000 Capronis, 50 to be assembled and 950 to be sent overseas knocked down. Drawings were prepared, but no official order was given for the machines.

On January 25 Capt. D'Annunzio and his men came to the plant, began work on a handmade machine. A witness describing the transaction states that—

"They (the aeroplane authorities), in February, began to back and fill on whether they were going to build Capronis in quantity, and by March 2 it was practically settled that they would not build Capronis in this country at all, except the ones we were working on and two or three for experimental purposes.

"As a result of that we took the Handley-Page as a substitute."

Capt. D'Annunzio states that he had expected upon his arrival in this country that everything would be ready. "They were wiring and cabling Italy, asking for the engineers of the Caproni plant. I requested Gen. Tozzi, who is head of the Purchase Mission, in Washington, to help me clear up the matter. So we provoked a lot of meetings between myself, Col. Deeds, and some other officers. * * * It was just the same as before, because no decisions were reached. * * * I found they were undecided as to whether they should make that machine, although demonstrations had been given before the European military mission," etc.

Finally Capt. D'Annunzio was authorized to build the first experimental machine for American engineers. That machine was finished and flown on July 7. In the meantime, and about April 12, the Fisher Body Co. obtained an oral contract for 250 Capronis, which was later canceled. Again, about May 18, 1918, the Curtiss Aeroplane Co. was given an order for 500 Capronis, and on the same day the Fisher Body Co. was given an order for 500 Capronis. It is understood, however, that nothing will be done to carry out this order until the experimental machine has been tested out. This precaution is proper.

During the interval of delay both of the Italian pilots who came to this country were killed in other machines, and the Caproni program is now awaiting the arrival of Italian pilots and the testing of the experimental machine.

Over 12 months of time has been thus consumed since the Caproni came under serious consideration.

Plans for the Handley-Page machine were supplied to the Signal Corps in the summer of 1917 by the owner, with full permission to use them. Its engineers made a number of changes in them, beyond which nothing was done with them. Hence, the representative of the owners in the early winter demanded their return. They were delivered to him as changed.

In February last contracts for 1,000 sets of parts, afterwards reduced to 500 sets of parts, were made with various contractors, to be assembled in Great Britain for the use of the American Army. From 60 to 90 days are required for the assembly of a Handley-Page machine. Twenty of these have been embarked, and we are informed that they will continue to go in constantly increasing quantity, reaching 140 for the month of February. Had these contracts been let last October they could have been completed and delivered by the 1st of July.

One sample machine constructed by the Standard Aircraft Corporation was completed and given its initial flying test on July 6 last. If further tests prove satisfactory the design will go into quantity production. Had the machine been ordered last summer it should be in quantity production now.

The production of training planes has been fairly adequate. One type, the Standard, of which there were 1,200, has recently been discarded because the Hall-Scott engine which drives it has proven unsatisfactory, but there is no reason to apprehend that training-plane production will fall below the requirements of the service. The designers and manufacturers of this plane insist that with a good engine it is all right, and this insistence will be tested. If successful, they can be made available hereafter. But Gen. Kenly and his assistants found them highly dangerous because of the motor and ordered their retirement. The machines cost the Government about $6,000,000.

THE DE HAVILAND 4.

The De Haviland 4 is the only so-called fighting plane now in actual production. Outstanding contracts call for 8,500 of them. They are being manufactured by the Dayton-Wright and the Fisher Body companies, with smaller contracts to the Standard and one or two other producers. On August 1 a total of about 1,000 of these had been delivered, all but a few of which had been turned out by the Dayton-Wright concern.

The first plane of this type was embarked for France during the latter part of February of this year, but never reached port. Up to July 1, 286 had been shipped abroad, of which 67 had reached headquarters in France. On August 1, 601 had been embarked. A number of them were delivered to Gen. Pershing's headquarters in June, and upon inspection were found to contain many defects, some of which were serious, others of less importance. Under date of June 26, Gen. Pershing cabled the War Department enumerating many defects and stating explicitly that the machines could not be used until some of them were corrected. Also that all planes of this class should be thoroughly tested and inspected before being shipped to him. This obvious requirement Gen. Kenly had insisted upon observing, but sent them over in the instance considered without doing so because of an overseas order requiring it.

Some of the defects enumerated in this report, in the opinion of every expert flyer who has been examined by the committee, rendered the machines more than ordinarily dangerous. Their opinions differed as to whether or not corrections can be made to make the machines safe, but the assertion that the plane is very unsafe in the condition in which it has been up to this time delivered from the factory was practically unanimous. Deliveries of the machine continued notwithstanding, and many were sent to France in precisely the condition complained of in Gen Pershing's cable. The explanation offered for continuing delivery of these defective planes is that the corrections could be made overseas, and a force of American officers and mechanics under command of Lieut. Col. Hall was dispatched to France about the middle of July with orders to make them. Your committee is of opinion that the planes should never have been permitted to leave the factory in their defective condition, and the fact that they were permitted to go shows either a lack of appreciation of the situation, a disregard for it, or a very poor system of inspection. On August 2 an order was issued to all the factories directing that no more of them be delivered until the corrections required were made. We are informed that production under these new conditions is about to be resumed.

In July 155 of these planes were delivered to the Navy, about 50 of which were shipped abroad, and approximately 100 crated and delivered at the seaboard for shipment. At this stage four of them selected from the lot were sent to the Navy testing field at Miami, Fla. A test and inspection there revealed the same defects that were reported by Gen. Pershing and some others. The commandant, Capt. McCaughtry, immediately reported this fact to the Navy Department, with the result that a cable was sent to Admiral Sims apprising him of the defective condition of those previously sent, while the 100 in crates at the port of embarkation were rejected and returned to the Aircraft Board.

Forty De Haviland 4's sent to a Long Island field about this time and tested out in the vicinity of New York were pronounced structurally weak and defective. With the production of the De Haviland 4 it has been the same story of changes. Many of these have been made in the plane since the board determined upon its manufacture. Some were unimportant, some extremely so; many of them undoubtedly necessary to its adaptation to the Liberty motor. But they have been made for the most part by automobile and mechanical engineers, having little or no experience in aviation engineering.

On the 28th, 29th, and 30th of July three squadrons of 18 machines each, 54 in all, having been overhauled by American and French mechanics at an American aviation base behind the French lines, were delivered to the front under their own power. These planes are said to have received the approval of Capt. de Havilland after a careful inspection. Assuming this to be true, it indicates that the machines sent over here have been carefully inspected and the defects remedied. On August 7 one squadron of these, comprising 18 machines, under command of Gen. Foulois, made an expedition across the German lines and returned in safety to their base. This marks the date of the use of the first American-built plane over the enemy's lines. The committee has no information regarding the character of their performance.

The character of the evidence concerning this machine, ranging from qualified approval to severest condemnation, shows that the De Haviland 4 is chiefly available for observation or reconnoissance purposes. That the War Department and the Aircraft Board share this view is best evidenced by the fact that it is to be replaced by a machine of later design as speedily as may be possible without complete suspension of production.

With the exception of the S. E. 5 and the Handley-Page, in parts, no other type of fighting plane can be produced in quantity before 1919.

The U. S. D. 9 plane is a redesign of the British D. H. 9, being a great improvement on the D. H. 4. But the U. S. D. 9 has not yet fully responded to the tests of the military bureau and will go into production only when it does so. The U. S. D. 9A, another and later design, now under test, promises to be a satisfactory machine. If the promise is fulfilled by the tests, the design will be adopted and substituted for the De Haviland 4.

Recognizing the fact that the United States would not produce planes in quantities early in the war, the board contracted with the English and French early in 1917 for a supply of fighting planes. Of these, 2,114, according to the latest testimony we were able to receive, have been from time to time delivered. This enabled us to maintain 13 squadrons of 18 fliers each on the front, a force which is wholly inadequate to meet requirements of modern warfare. It should also be stated that as our troops are moving to France in great numbers, the disparity may increase until we get into quantity production. It is proper to call attention to the fact that at an investigation of the War Department by the Military Committee, held in January and February, 1918, the committee was assured that the French could and would furnish all the combat planes we needed, provided we would send them the raw material, and that this material was being furnished. This assurance was given when the committee showed anxiety at the continued delay in the shipping of planes.

In January Gen. Squier and Col. Deeds testified to this fact and Secretary Baker gave similar assurance to the committee. The facts, however, are as shown by the testimony of Gen. Kenly, given on July 20, that the plan failed for two reasons. We quote his testimony:

"The French contract practically fell down, as you know. * * * It was due to what I consider two reasons. In the first place, the contracts with the French were dependent upon the sending of raw material that was to be furnished by us, and we did not live up to our agreement. * * * In the second place, the increase in German activities in the air caused a change of program in French aviation construction. * * * The French contracts fell down, so that we became more or less dependent upon what could be furnished on this side."

Besides this, many of the machines our men are now forced to use in France are unsatisfactory, but not more so than those used by the French themselves. An Army officer recently at the front testified that the American troops are using many antiquated machines purchased from the French that were discarded by them a year and a half ago. They are using the Sopwith, 1½ strutter, which has been declared unsafe by the French and British for observation work. They are using the A. R., equipped with Renault 220, which has a ceiling of only 10,000 feet. They use a Spad two-seater, which is unreliable and unsatisfactory. They were using a few French Briguet machines and the Sampson, which is a French machine. It is reassuring to reflect that all commands are unified in France, with all lines of the service under a common protection.

The Liberty 12-cylinder engine is an excellent one for the heavier planes and certain other purposes. Its weight of 825 pounds and its 400 horsepower makes it too heavy and too powerful for the lighter types. It is not yet perfect, but it is improving under repeated tests and experiments, which disclose defects for elimination and suggest changes and readjustment of its parts. It is now in quantity production, more than 4,000 having been delivered, and is approved by our allies, who are anxious to obtain more of them than we can at present supply.

In the development of this motor the Aircraft Board has performed an important task, for which due credit should be given. But the announcement that it had been evolved in a few days was unfounded, and the notion which was encouraged that it could be used for planes of all sizes and character was largely responsible for delays to our plane program.

Motor production has proved to be a formidable task, magnified in some degree by the reluctance of the designers to promptly accept and act upon suggestions of imperfections from competent engineers and critics and fliers and make changes in conformity with them.

The manufacture of the best foreign motors, among which are the Rolls-Royce, Hispano-Suiza, and Fiat, contemporaneously with the development of an American engine would have been the sounder policy. That it was partially adopted later confirms this conclusion. We are doing what should have been done a year ago and are producing the 150 and 180 horsepower Hispano-Suiza motor in quantity. Deliveries of the Le Rhone, Bugatti, and 300-horsepower Hispano-Suiza will follow.

American concerns are making the Rolls-Royce motor for the British Government and should long since have been making them for ours. The smaller types of Hispano-Suiza are serviceable for the lighter and faster planes. In view of these conditions, the apprehension of a year ago that we could not produce foreign motors in quantity because of their metrical measurements and intricacies of construction, requiring manual instead of machine work, which we did not possess, becomes untenable.

No fighting plane of American or other design has been built around the Liberty engine, although it is an axiom in aeronautics that planes must be adapted to motors. The Aircraft Board authorized some attempts at this all-important work, one by Capt. Le Pere and one by Col. Clarke, the first of which is being tested and developed by the board with good prospects of success. This should have been done before, as the type must be made effective before the best performance of the Liberty motor can be secured. A Curtiss design also gives promise of satisfactory results in the near future. The motor can be used in some other models with good results, but until a Liberty plane is successfully built around a Liberty motor by competent aeronautic engineers and thoroughly tested out our air program will not be complete.

INSPECTION.

The Signal Corps inspection system has paralleled that of the producers. In some instances it has functioned badly, with the result that defective material has at times been accepted and material condemned and reported to chief inspectors has found its way back to the producer. In some factories the finished product has been accepted, although not up to requirements. Generally speaking, the production and inspection systems of the manufacturers seem to be more cooperative than competitive. We have found no collusion between the official and the private inspector, but the inspection in the past has been bad. The faults of the system are in part due to the incompetency of the inspectors. We are informed that the system has undergone and is now undergoing a radical transformation and is being remedied as rapidly as skilled and efficient operators can be secured.

TRAINING AND TESTING FIELDS.

The training fields are each designed for 600 enlisted men, 300 cadets, and 72 officers, a total of 972 men, which, owing to the exigencies of the service, have at times been exceeded. This arrangement requires a total of 54 structures of all sorts for each standard field. In addition to these, there are repair and supply depots, balloon schools, experimental stations, radio laboratories, warehouses, quarantine camps, temporary barracks, photograph schools, etc.

Up to May 25 last there were 31 fields, including balloon schools and experimental stations, and 37 miscellaneous projects comprised in the above recital, not including the training schools at various State and other universities nor projects recommended but not yet approved by the War Department. Their estimated cost is $52,511,134, of which $39,356,407 have been expended, exclusive of a field at Miami, Fla., established by Col. E. A. Deeds, a member of the board, on his own responsibility (and without the knowledge or sanction of the head of the equipment division having charge of the work), and a night flying route from Dayton, Ohio, to Rantoul, Ill., by way of Indianapolis. The cost of these extra projects was over $400,000. This night flying route was used for the first time on the night of August 12 between Dayton and Indianapolis, and was pronounced satisfactory by Gen. Charles E. Lee and Capt. J. Fitz Morris, of the British air service, and the aviators who made the trip.

The Equipment Division had some difficulty in securing material for construction prior to the advent of Mr. W. C. Potter, now assistant director of the Production Board, since which time there has been much improvement.

The contractors for the work at Langley Field and the fields at Dayton were not satisfactory. Upon the whole, the work of construction proceeded fairly well, and the structures on most of the fields have been completed.

Langley Field, near Newport News, Va., consisting of 1,650 acres, was selected prior to our entry into the war for a training and experimental field. The estimated cost of its needed buildings, not yet completed, is $3,664,050, of which $2,305,697 have been expended. It seems to have been wisely chosen and well fitted for testing and experimental work. Nevertheless it was practically abandoned last year for that class of work, and McCook Field, at Dayton, Ohio, consisting of but 200 acres, and practically inclosed by river, trees, and telephone and telegraph wires, was selected instead and leased at an annual rental of $12,500. The reason assigned to the committee for this change was the lack of transportation facilities at Langley, although a spur connecting it with near-by railway systems had been constructed by the Government for its express accommodation prior to the transfer. The insufficiency of this reason is emphasized by the fact that about the same time the board selected the Wilbur Wright training field, near Dayton, requiring the construction of a trolley line by the Government at a cost of $175,000, which is its only line of transportation. The field is now being used by the Bureau of Aeronautics for its military testing plant. McCook Field is not only too small for satisfactory experimental flying, but its environment is unfavorable to its use for that purpose. The board has, however, equipped it with structures costing $920,100.

Adjoining the Wilbur Wright Field is a large warehouse, built at a cost of some $500,000. In this warehouse are stored great quantities of supplies, many of which, like machine guns, radio batteries, photographic accessories, etc., are manufactured in the East. To send them hundreds of miles west for storage, reshipping them over the same route back to the seaboard when needed for over-seas uses, is waste. It needlessly adds to railway congestion and should be corrected.

Your committee visited but a few of the training fields, of which Wilbur Wright Field, above referred to, was one. It comprises 2,200 acres and belongs to the Dayton Conservancy Association, and is designed as a part of the bed of a great reservoir to hold back the flood waters of Mad River. Much of it is low and swampy, either on a level with or slightly above the normal level of the stream flow. Any considerable rainfall floods a great portion of it, and a rain of 36 hours last March caused an overflow of nearly 2 feet above the floors of the hangars, thus seriously threatening the planes with damage and suspending training completely. A drainage system, since installed, is said to have improved this condition, but your committee is informed that the Signal Corps was advised by competent authority against locating a field upon these premises because of its low and marshy character, and the judgment of the officers and fliers at the field and familiar with the ground was a unit against its adaptability. An excellent stretch of ground within 4 miles of this field, traversed by railway and high above the river level, admirably drained by nature, was available to the board when Wilbur Wright Field was selected.

The large sums expended upon the Dayton-Wright Field, amounting to $2,878,699, and requiring an ultimate total of $3,097,777 and its use for testing purposes, probably demands its present retention if the drainage system referred to shall prove fairly effective. But, when the dam is completed—the reservoir is to be filled—the buildings must be removed or they will be submerged.

More recently the board, desiring an additional field near Dayton, was offered an acreage adjoining the Dayton-Wright Airplane Factory on the east. Inasmuch, however, as insistence was made that the lease be executed to the Dayton-Wright Co., as lessee for the use of the board, the rental to be made an item in the cost of airplane production, the representatives of the board very properly declined the suggestion, and the project is still incomplete. We feel obliged to note in this connection that shortly before negotiations for the McCook and the new field, Col. E. A. Deeds, a member of the Aircraft Board, was the owner of the first and a part owner in the second. He sold and transferred them to interests with which he had been identified and which now own them.

CONTRACTS FOR PLANES, MOTORS, AND ACCESSORIES.

At the outbreak of the war but few concerns were engaged in airplane and motor construction; but there were concerns devoted to other pursuits and potentially capable of producing both in quantity if encouraged to do so. The need for planes in volume, and as rapidly as possible, prompted Congress to make the largest single appropriation for the Signal Corps which up to that time had ever been made. Since then our engine-producing capacity has been fairly enlisted, while that of plane production has not been properly encouraged. A number of plane manufacturers, like the Wittemann-Lewis Co., of New Jersey, and in the business years prior to the outbreak of the war, have been unable to obtain contracts, while a number of concerns like the Dayton-Wright Co. and the Standard Co. have been practically organized since the war, and the former was given enormous contracts before its factories were completed.

Companies assured of capital and factory space have been denied contracts because they were not going concerns, while other companies in similar condition have received contracts, notwithstanding their present lack of producing equipment. No one official controlled or supervised the making of agreements or their execution. Beginning and ending with the Aircraft Board, the head of production, the director of supplies, the head of the contract section, and perhaps other links made up the chain of procedure. Adopting models of proved efficiency and then putting all responsible producers at work upon them would, in the opinion of your committee, have greatly expedited, as it would have guaranteed, the performance of the aircraft program.

To aid in the construction of the Dayton-Wright plant and the Elmwood plant of the Curtiss Co., the board made generous advances of money, and to them was given the task of making and supplying other contractors with plans, designs, blue prints, and specifications for the accepted types of machines, exclusive of bombing planes. This gave these concerns great advantage over their competitors, which thus became dependent upon them for material without which the work of production could not begin, and when begun was subject to suspension and delay with changes in construction and design. Moreover, the Curtiss Co. exacted a fee for copies of plans, etc., of 1 per cent upon the contract price from other contractors, which, although added to the cost of production, was paid to the Curtiss Co., adding a considerable aggregate sum to its revenues.

The number and amount of contracts for planes and motors assigned to concerns at Dayton and Detroit and the number and character of aviation fields at Dayton could not fail to attract the attention of your committee. Due to her vast automobile industry, Detroit doubtless possessed greater facilities for gas-engine production than any other American community, and the Fisher-Body Co. was well equipped for the manufacture of planes in quantity. A generous recognition of these facts was therefore inevitable.

But Dayton possessed no such advantages. Her manufacturing interests were for the most part in other directions. Industrially considered, the concentration of the greater part of the new pursuits in these two cities may perhaps be justified, but the committee is forced to the conclusion that the personnel of the Aviation Board, from its formation to its reconstruction, explains the fact.

The civilian personnel of the board and their more prominent subordinates were composed of gentlemen a very considerable number of whom lived in these cities and before or at the time of entering the Government service were leaders in and identified with the industrial development of their respective communities. The divestiture of their interests by transfer to others was a laudable though essential step toward qualifying them to public service, but the granting of major contracts to old associates, the transfer of the experimental station from Langley to Dayton, and installing it upon an inadequate tract, quite recently the property of a member of the board, the tender and qualified acceptance of a second field, formerly owned in part by the same member, the selection of the Wilbur Wright Field, physically and geographically unsuited for the purpose, and the giving of huge contracts for airplanes to a corporation created since the war began, of which he was one of the first officers, and owned exclusively by his former partners and business associates, have provoked, and we think justly, much of the public comment which made the investigation imperative and much of the resentment of less-favored manufacturers in other localities. It is also a distinct argument for those who assume to fear and who assert that aviation, through the board, is to be made the subject of ultimate automobile control. This feature of the subject is, as heretofore stated, under full investigation by the Department of Justice.

CROSS-LICENSE REQUIREMENT.

Although this subject has been referred to a special subcommittee for investigation, it has constantly obtruded itself upon our attention, hence we can not avoid referring to it.

The National Advisory Committee of Aeronautics, confronted with the necessity of satisfying the claims of patentees and avoiding possible delays threatened by conflicting patent rights, determined upon mature consideration to settle these difficulties through the agency of a Manufacturers' Aircraft Corporation, to be composed of those engaged in the industry and empowered to license all aircraft contractors, who should pay a royalty to the company upon all planes and parts to be constructed, and to assign to the company for the common use all patents or applications therefor owned or controlled by the licensees. The bulk of these royalties was to be paid to the Curtiss and the Wright-Martin companies as compensation for the use of certain patents until each had received $2,000,000. These were to be charged against cost of production and paid by the Government. The agreement was sanctioned by the Department of Justice and approved by the Secretaries of War and the Navy.

The committee has not heard a word in approval of it. It is condemned by every airplane manufacturer outside of the immediate beneficiaries. Those executing the license agreements have done so under protest because the Aircraft Board recommended or required it.

Criticisms of it are numerous, the most serious of them being that it subjects manufacturers to onerous requirements by its beneficiaries, such as assessments for the use of plans and specifications, the purchase of the material and accessories from favored houses, the assignment and surrender of valuable patents and patentable devices to the Aircraft Association upon terms prescribed by itself, the discouragement of invention, and the inevitable control of the aircraft industry by that association or by some other interest through its agency. Your committee sympathizes with many of these sentiments, and notwithstanding the Aircraft Production Board as now officered no longer requires or recommends the execution of the agreements by contractors, we believe the arrangement should be abrogated. We regard it as vicious and as designed to reap large profits by taking advantage of the necessities of the Government. The basic patentees should, of course, if the patents are valid, be compensated, but this should be done by the Government directly whenever the courts finally determine who the owners are, and the patents should then be made free to all manufacturers.

New patents of meritorious character should be similarly acquired by the Government as they appear. Such a course would stimulate invention and promote the development of an art which is still in its cradle.

This is not a new departure but rather a reversion to an earlier policy, for Congress in 1917 appropriated $1,000,000 for the purchase of aircraft patents, which sum is still available, and if insufficient for the purpose it can be easily increased. The Government should never be made the victim of a patent monopoly which it generously created for the sole protection of the inventor against infringement by persons and corporations.

DIFFICULTIES OF AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION.

Much can be said in extenuation of the disappointments encountered in aircraft production. The industry is new and highly technical. Mechanics skilled in the art were few when the war began, and of aviation engineers there were scarcely any. Production capacity was undeveloped, and even planes for training were not immediately obtainable. Up to January, 1917, only 118 airplanes of all types had been delivered to the Army, 64 of which were made in 1916, and there was no aircraft organization either in the Signal Corps or out of it. The Bolling Commission was not sent to Europe until June, and its report was not received until September. But for the glowing forecast and optimistic announcements which the board and others made to the public from time to time regarding its actual and prospective performance, and the certainty of speedy and unlimited production, public disappointment would not have been so pronounced nor public resentment so widespread. Great Britain in 1915 and 1916 experienced delays, miscarriages, and expenditures. Instead of profiting by her experiences the board incurred similar ones and accentuated them by representations and assurances which were not warranted by the actual facts.

The order of the President creating a Military Bureau of Aeronautics and a Director of Aircraft Production and the appointment of Gen. Kenly and Mr. Ryan as the heads of the two divisions is an improvement upon the previous situation, and a number of the conditions we have criticized have been or are in the process of being corrected and better methods instituted. For example, a single board of engineers, formed by combining the technical and production engineering sections and headed by a chief selected by Mr. Ryan, with the approval of Gen. Kenly, has been established; one testing board under the command of a single officer has succeeded the double system formerly doing the work. The Military Bureau, under agreement with the director, after thorough experiments by actual fliers and aeronautic engineers, now determines the character of machine to be produced, and the business of the director is to produce it.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

1. The inspection of the finished product and other material is now the work of Gen. Kenly's division and is to be done by thoroughly competent officers. Work not satisfactory to Gen. Kenly or not up to the requirements of his bureau is rejected. Cooperation for the common end has been, and we hope will be, observed by the heads of the two divisions and required from their subordinates. The loose ends of the former organization have been gathered up as rapidly as possible, and the results of the improved conditions are already apparent in some directions. But the system is still subject to the criticism that it is dual in character, which is unsatisfactory, since it may at any time lead to differences and to division of responsibility. We are constrained, therefore, to renew the committee's recommendation of last April, sustained by the opinion of every man whose views were consulted by us, that the whole subject should be under the control of one man. Our present organization is faulty because divided into two parts with a man of strong will and opinion at the head of each division. While these two divisions are correlated, they may not be permanently coordinated. Your committee therefore believes that the importance and magnitude of aviation as a permanent branch of our military organization requires one directing and responsible head both for its efficiency and speedy development. Its classification with the Army and Navy as a distinct arm of the service is essential to this end.

Of comparative insignificance at the outbreak of hostilities in 1914, aviation has become indispensable in modern warfare. Without aircraft no army can any longer hope to triumph or, indeed, to escape inevitable defeat. Without aircraft the most powerful navy must in these days remain upon the defensive. The aircraft force of Great Britain and France each outnumbered the Regular Army of the United States when we declared war, and ours should soon be as large as theirs. It is a distinct arm of the service. Great Britain and France, recognizing its supreme importance and the need of its swift expansion, last year each covered it into a department of its own, whose head, as minister of the air, ranks as an officer of the cabinet, who is held responsible for efficiency of production and manufacture and an efficient force of aerial fighters. We should do likewise—create a department of aviation, under the control and supervision of a secretary, and ranking with those of the Army and the Navy. We would thus place power and responsibility in the hands of a single man, organize a service not alone for this war but for all time, and establish for the forces of the air the same policy of administration that has so long governed those of the land and of the seas.

The cost of equipment and maintenance is rapidly approaching that of the Navy, while training for aviation is as distinct and as technical as that at West Point and Annapolis.

The creation of the department of the air would unify the service, thus removing all friction between the Army and the Navy divisions of the service by subjecting both to the control of a common head. Differences between them under present conditions are unavoidable, and, while more disagreeable than serious so far, they will arise from time to time, tending to seriously disturb the service, besides interfering with production.

2. A commission of engineers and pilots for observation at the front, formed into relays and reporting in person to the department at frequent intervals, is also imperatively demanded. The betterment of the air service through the exigencies of actual warfare is rapid and important. They should be accurately and promptly reported in detail to the home office, and this can be efficiently done in no other manner. Similar conditions have long been maintained by our allies, whose policy in this regard we will do well to adopt.

3. But your committee feels that the prime need of the hour is machines in continuing quantity, and the production of them should be accelerated by enlisting the constructive activities of all responsible concerns engaged or which can be engaged in the business to full capacity. We can not, while the war lasts, have too many effective planes. Supremacy of the air means a speedy triumph. We have hundreds of trained pilots waiting for planes, whose services must be postponed for their production.

Planes to be useful must have motors. These, too, should be in production in every factory that can and will turn them out, due allowance being, of course, made for other equally insistent requirements for ordnance, ships, and the like. If this is done, the results for 1919 will then compensate somewhat for the disappointments of the current year.

4. The rapid development during the war of the aeroplane and its effective use as an important arm of the military, makes it imperative that America give greater attention to the perfection and production of aircraft. This should be done not only as a war measure but as a commercial and industrial necessity.

The importance of a powerful air force and an abundance of heavy artillery can not be overstated in bringing the war to a speedy and successful conclusion. With our vast resources in raw material and our facilities for manufacture we can, by the adoption of a broad program and with the assistance of our allies, obtain the complete supremacy of the air.

Without hesitation or delay we must give attention to this expansion of our aircraft policy. The inventive and productive genius and energy of America must be devoted to the creation and improvement of new types of aircraft and engines. Our present program must be greatly enlarged. The United States should establish at Government expense college and university courses in aero dynamics and mechanical engineering, in addition to courses for training fliers.

While quantity production is essential to the complete equipment of our armed forces, quality should not be sacrificed to quantity. The aeroplane requires the highest degree of skill in workmanship and the very best kind of materials.

The aeroplane is a product of American genius, but the credit for its development largely belongs to other nations. America should meet this challenge by bringing the aeroplane to still greater efficiency.

5. The inventive genius of the Nation should be encouraged in the most effective way. A Bureau of Inventions, recently established by the War Department, is a step in the right direction. A persistent complaint, doubtless in a large degree due to the disappointment of men whose devices have not been pronounced practicable, is that under the administration of the old board scant consideration has been given to new devices and suggestions. This seems principally to have resulted from the absence of any well-defined individual agency having full authority to deal with the subject. One man, the designer of a model for a dirigible with a car integral with the Blimp, began with the Advisory Committee and was passed on from one officer to another until he finally completed the circle and was referred back to the committee which started him on his journey. About six months were consumed in making the circuit and nothing was accomplished. A plane designer encountered a similar experience, with the added one that his plane was crushed to pieces in a sand test which was declared satisfactory by those who made it but wholly unsatisfactory by those empowered to make final decisions. Many, perhaps most, of the so-called inventions brought to the notice of the authorities in times like this are of no importance. But if the germ of something new and useful can be detected in one of a multitude of models the time and energy expended in discovering it will redound to the benefit of the Nation.

6. Ample protection should be extended by the Patent Office to applicants for patents for inventions relating to the public welfare and defense. This is demanded not so much for the inventor as for the Nation. Authority for this now exists, but it seems to be exercised at times and disregarded at others. Additional legislation may be necessary to make this precaution effective, but in the meantime a suggestion from the Production Board to the Commissioner of Patents regarding applications for inventions relating to aircraft would doubtless shield the application from all publicity, thus assuring its indemnity against disclosure to enemy interests.

7. The margin of profit on some contracts, particularly for motor production, is altogether too high. According to the estimates of the accounting division they appear to be for the Liberty motor at one of the plants, 33.6 per cent; for Liberty engine aluminum pistons, 285 per cent on capital invested; for the Le Rhone, 92.8 per cent on cost of production; and on the D. H. 4 plane about 50 per cent. This is largely due to the primary unfamiliarity of officials with the cost of rapid manufacture of novel products in great and urgent demand.

The high cost to the Government having been now demonstrated, we feel sure that future contracts will result in great saving to the Government.

8. Planes and engines rejected because of defective construction or materials not furnished by the Government direct should be at the cost of the producer. Existing agreements require payment from the Government for everything delivered, presumably because they have passed official inspection. But when producers are required under their agreements to bear the expense of an inferior product, on the perfection of which human life is absolutely dependent, their own inspection will be of the best, and good workmanship will inevitably result.

9. Your committee in inspecting the aircraft plants have noticed the great danger of destruction by fire, owing to hazardous processes of manufacture, hasty construction, lack of automatic sprinkler and other fire protection.

The burning of any of these factories, in whole or in part, at this time would be a catastrophe, for it would greatly cripple the aircraft program.

We urgently recommend that the requirements of the Fire Prevention Bureau of the National Council of Defense, composed of fire insurance experts, for better fire protection in these factories be made immediately compulsory by the Director of Aircraft Production, and that a stipulation be inserted in future contracts compelling a compliance with such recommendations.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in connection with the report, as heretofore stated, I offer for insertion in the RECORD, without reading, a letter and telegram regarding the same subject from Mr. Howard E. Coffin, formerly at the head of the Aircraft Board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter and telegram will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DETROIT, August 14, 1918.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of copies of Judge Garrison's communication to you under date of July 26 and of your reply thereto under date of July 27.

The misleading publicity referred to by Judge Garrison continues to emanate from Washington at regular intervals, and has its inception in the fact that neither in the press nor in the public mind has there ever been a proper understanding of the status of the Aircraft Board or of its nonexecutive relation to the War and Navy Departments. Even in Washington, except in the minds of those having special knowledge of the facts, there has been a tendency to ascribe to the Aircraft Board executive and administrative powers similar to those of the Shipping Board or its Emergency Fleet Corporation and capabilities of action independent of the War and Navy Departments.

Much of this confusion of mind has arisen from the fact that three Army officers appointed by the Secretary of War to membership on the board and the three naval representatives appointed by the Secretary of the Navy have served in the dual capacity, namely, in an advisory and entirely nonexecutive rôle when sitting with the board but as executive officers having full power when functioning in their capacity as bureau heads of the War and Navy Departments.

I trust that, in simple justice to Mr. Howe, Mr. Thayer, and myself, as the civilian members of the Aircraft Board, vested with no executive powers of any kind, and dependent for all information concerning and contact with the technical and administrative phases of the Army and Navy aircraft programs upon the duly constituted representatives and channels of these governmental departments, such a clean-cut distinction and statement of fact may be incorporated in your report as will place before the American people the true status and relations of the three organizations involved in the governmental aircraft program.

For your reference I am inclosing you herewith a chart wherein these relations are clearly set forth in accordance with the rulings of counsel of the Aircraft Board, of the office of the Judge Advocate General of the Army, and the Secretaries of War and of the Navy.

The relations of the three civilian members of the Aircraft Board and of the board itself have been exactly the same to the Navy Department as to the Army, and neither the successes nor the failures of either of these departments in technical or administrative lines can be ascribed to the civilian members of the board.

All decisions as to types of planes and engines put into production have been made by the technical organizations of the War and Navy Departments, and all resolutions relating to the placing of contracts have originated within these departments before being brought before the Aircraft Board for clearance.

It has been only within these governmental departments that there has existed a sufficient knowledge as to the requirements of the air services to permit the origination of decisions and actions of this kind. Certainly Howe, Thayer, and myself, as the three civilian members, did not dictate in any way in such matters.

All contracts for aircraft have been made by the duly qualified bureaus of the War and Navy Departments, and the details of these contracts negotiated by the executive officers of these departments. The administration of all aircraft contracts has from the beginning lain entirely within the hands of the departments and bureaus of the Army and Navy services, and neither the civilian members of the Aircraft Board nor the board as such has ever exercised jurisdiction in these lines. It is significant in this connection that the Navy program, bearing the same relation to the Aircraft Board and its civilian members as that of the Army, and using the same forms of contract, has gone ahead and at high speed, while that of the Army has been and is still in difficulties.

Quoting from the fifth paragraph of your letter addressed to Judge Garrison, you state "that he was before the committee last January or February for something over two days, and if the program which he discussed at the time had been 10 per cent as well advanced as he then assured us it was the present investigation would have been unnecessary."

Permit me to point out to you:

1. That in these two days' hearing the subject of aviation was discussed only for a considerable portion of the first day, and that a part of the first day and the whole of the second was given over to a discussion of the general industrial situation in the conduct of the war.

See page 2253 "Investigation of the War Department Hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs of the United States Senate, Sixty-fifth Congress, Part 6, January 30 to February 2, 1918."

2. That all information given by me to the Senate committee, that portion of the first day's hearing devoted to aircraft, was, of necessity, furnished to me through the War and Navy Department channels having responsibility for aircraft production, that this information was exactly the same as that being supplied by the Signal Corps of the Army to the Secretary of War and that War Department officers having the confidential military and production aircraft programs in their charge were assigned for attendance in the Senate committee rooms during my hearing in order that these reports and records might be available for reference.

3. Under the restrictions of the bill creating the Aircraft Board limiting its activities to those of a nonexecutive nature and prohibiting the building up of any office or organization parallel or duplicating the activities of the executive bureaus of the War and Navy Departments, it should be clear that the civilian members of the board were dependent entirely upon the official representatives of those executive departments for reports as to military or naval plans and progress of production. I believe it has never been within the power of the three civilian members of the board, even had the necessity been recognized, to institute a thorough-going investigation as to the truth or falsity of these War and Navy Department reports made to the board and supplied to the chairman of the board for use in the Senate committee hearing. It has seemingly required months of investigation, backed by full executive power, to enable either the Senate committee or the Judge Hughes committee to get before them the facts concerning the technical and managerial difficulties of the War Department in the carrying out of its aircraft program. It should be evident, therefore, that the civilian members of the Aircraft Board could scarcely have inaugurated an investigation of the business management and progress of the War and Navy Departments' administrative bureaus, particularly in view of the fact that at the time of the Senate committee hearing of February 1 there was no realization of the necessity for such investigation.

4. In view of the figures, schedules, and reports furnished by the War Department at the time of the Senate hearing, I believe my testimony before this body to have been most conservative. Permit me to call to your attention your own question addressed to Gen. Squier, to be found at the bottom of page 2134 of the Senate hearings; also to the question of Senator WADSWORTH, addressed to Col. Deeds, middle of page 2153; also to statement by Chairman CHAMBERLAIN, middle of page 2157. These references indicate clearly that my statement before the committee had not been a glowing or unduly optimistic one. In my first day's hearing before you I did point out to your committee the peculiar nonexecutive and purely advisory relation in which the board stood to the Army and Navy services under the creating act of October 1. I also transmitted to your committee the information furnished by the Signal Corps that it was expected that 1,900 planes would have been shipped for overseas service prior to July 1. Permit me also to call to your attention the contents of the four paragraphs on page 2209 of the Senate hearing, comprising Col. Deeds' description of the manner in which the War and Navy Departments' decisions as to types of planes and engines were arrived at, the method of placing contracts and the advisory or clearing-house relation of the Aircraft Board to these contractural activities.

In connection with the Senate hearing I distinctly remember stating to the committee that inasmuch as the relations of the civilian members of the board to the Army and Navy programs were indirect, it would be necessary for the committee to obtain any detailed information it might desire from the War Department officers having executive charge of the work. I believe that several such officers were subsequently called before the committee and military and production information furnished in answer to inquiries of the members of the Senate committee.

In leaving this subject of the Senate hearing in January, permit me to say that I do not believe that you or any other member of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S committee believes that I in any way purposely misled you as to the situation. I transmitted to you gentlemen War Department information which was being embodied in reports both to the Aircraft Board and to the Secretary of War and frankly resent any inference suggesting deception. In the records of the Aircraft Board for December and January will be found reports made to the board by the War Department representatives as to production progress. At one of the January meetings just prior to the Senate hearing the Secretary of War was himself in attendance when production reports were presented by the Signal Corps.

My statements in these matters can, should you so desire, be verified by referring them to Mr. Richard F. Howe, of the International Harvester Co., the civilian member appointed to membership upon the board by President Wilson in November. Mr. Howe is now in Washington and can be reached care the Aircraft Board, of which he still remains a member.

Very truly, yours,

H. E. COFFIN.

DETROIT, MICH., August 16, 1918.

Hon. C. S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

In connection with your report as chairman of the Senate aircraft committee, may I not ask that in fairness to Messrs. Howe, Thayer, and myself, as the three civilian members of the Aircraft Board, having no executive relation to the engineering, contracting, accounting, production, or inspection work of the departments, you will give careful consideration to the contents of my letter of August 14, to the end that both the Senate and the press may be informed as to the correct status of the three organizations involved in the governmental aircraft program, namely, the War and Navy Departments and the nonexecutive advisory Aircraft Board. Much misunderstanding of the situation has arisen because of the dual functions of the officer members of the Aircraft Board, namely, advisory and nonexecutive when sitting with the board, but executive when functioning as the heads of Army and Navy bureaus. All technical and executive work as to selection of types of machines and their production has by law and by necessity rested until within the jurisdiction of the governmental departments, upon which the civilian members of the board have been dependent for all information and for all contact with military and naval air service progress.

H. E. COFFIN.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask whether the report is to be printed in document form?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a report of a committee, and will be printed in the usual form.

ADMISSION OF ALIENS (H. DOC. NO. 1262).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Acting Secretary of State, submitting a draft of a joint resolution authorizing the admission into the United States of aliens who are refugees from conditions created by the war.

I earnestly recommend this humane project to the favorable consideration of Congress.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 22, 1918.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. R. 12704. An act to authorize the importation without the payment of duty of sundry articles for the American National Red Cross to be donated or used by it solely to or for the benefit of the land or naval forces of the United States or its allies, or for the relief of the civilian population of the United States or of its allies, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

H. J. Res. 289. Joint resolution for the appointment of four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Frelinghuysen	Martin	Sherman
Bankhead	Gulon	Nelson	Shields
Beckham	Hale	New	Simmons
Borah	Henderson	Norris	Smith, Md.
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	Nugent	Smoot
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Sutherland
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Penrose	Thomas
Culberson	Kellogg	Pittman	Trammell
Cummins	Kendrick	Poindexter	Underwood
Curtis	Kenyon	Pomerene	Vardaman
Dillingham	Kirby	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Fall	Knox	Robinson	Watson
Fernald	McCumber	Saulsbury	Weeks
Fletcher	McKellar	Shafroth	Willey
France	McNary	Sheppard	Wolcott

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent, on account of illness in his family. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SWANSON] is detained at home by illness in his family.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is detained at home by illness.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. BAIRD], who is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

SOLDIERS' VOTE.

Mr. TRAMMEL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 293), which was read:

Whereas those splendid American citizens who are nobly serving their country in the Army and Navy are representative of America's most patriotic and loyal citizenship; and

Whereas on account of their absence on duty in the military and naval forces of the United States they will be deprived of the exercise of their right of franchise, except when a method is provided by their respective States for them to vote when absent from their homes on election days; and

Whereas in a number of the States no law has been enacted which authorizes and provides for those in the Army and Navy to vote while absent from home in the service of their country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the States which have not heretofore enacted laws providing an ample and complete method for soldiers and sailors in the Army and Navy to participate in the primaries and general elections be, and they are hereby, urgently requested to enact such laws immediately upon the convening of their respective legislatures; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished to the governors of the several States of the Union.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the request of the Senator from Florida with regard to the resolution?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It is a very brief resolution, and I do not see that there can be any objection to it. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. ASHURST. I did not hear it. Let it be read again.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

GRATITUDE TO THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 168) tendering public acknowledgment of gratitude to the Army and Navy of the United States.

Mr. POMERENE rose.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will not object if there is going to be no discussion on this subject.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not expect to discuss it, but I was going to suggest an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the thanks of Congress and of the people of the United States are due, and are hereby tendered, to the officers, soldiers, and sailors of the United States Army and Navy for their gallant and arduous service and splendid accomplishments in the present struggle. By their skill, energy, and enthusiasm they have sustained the best traditions of American valor and achievement and have inspired the world with confidence in the ultimate triumph of those principles of right and justice for the vindication of which we entered the war.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy communicate this resolution in appropriate form to the officers, soldiers, and sailors of the Army and Navy.

Mr. POMERENE. The marines are recognized as a distinct branch of our service. Of course, they are embraced in the term "soldiers," but I suggest that the joint resolution be amended by inserting the word "marines," so that it will read "soldiers, sailors, and marines."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have no objection to that amendment. I assume that the term "soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy" will include marines, but in conformity with the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, I will be glad to have the word "marines" inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, before the word "sailors," strike out the word "and" and after the word "sailors" insert the words "and marines," so as to read "to the officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines of the United States Army and Navy."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I move the same amendment on page 2.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, before the word "sailors," strike out the word "and" and after the word "sailors" insert the words "and marines," so as to read "to the officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Army and Navy."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask that the sentiment of the Senate upon the passage of the joint resolution be declared by a rising vote, and as a tribute to those who have made the supreme sacrifice I request that Senators will remain standing for one minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from New Mexico that under the rule the only way a rising vote can be had is by demanding a division. Does the Senator demand a division?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do. I ask unanimous consent that the vote may be taken by the Senate rising.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico asks unanimous consent that the vote be taken by a rising vote, and that Senators remain standing for one minute. The Chair hears no objection.

The question was put on a division, Senators standing for one minute, after which the Presiding Officer declared that the joint resolution was passed unanimously.

CHANGES OF DRAFT AGE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4856, known as the man-power or draft bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest that it be taken up by unanimous consent. There will be no objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that course. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will take the liberty of suggesting to the Senator from Oregon that under the rules debate is limited to five minutes during the morning hour, unless the bill be taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4856) to amend sections 2, 4, and 5 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I would not under ordinary circumstances make any statement in reference to this bill because the substance of it has been discussed so many times that not only the Senate but the country is familiar with its terms.

The essential changes in the selective-service law of May 18, 1917, affect the minimum and maximum ages of those who come within the terms of its provisions. Another provision by way of amendment, which was added to the bill by the Senate Military Affairs Committee, is known as the work-or-fight provision. In view of the very many letters and telegrams that I have received with reference to both these subjects I am led to make a few observations in regard to the bill, after which I shall undertake to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the necessities of our Government which have suggested this present amendment to the selective-service law.

Objections have come to me, Mr. President, against the lowering of the draft age to 18; and many of the letters and telegrams which have come in protest against this lowering of the age charge that it is proposed by our Government, and particularly by the Military Affairs Committee, to rob the cradle in order to send young men to the front to defend not only the liberties of America but the civilization of the world. On the other hand, there have come to me protests, in the way of telegrams and letters, against the inclusion in the bill of any above 31 years of age, as provided in the present selective-service act. In these protests it is charged that it is the purpose of our Government, and of the Congress as well, to reach out and drag the old as well as the young into the service of their country and to send them forward to be sacrificed in this terrible war.

Mr. President, the people who make protests against the calling into the service not only of the young men of 18 to 21 but also of men from 31 to 45 years of age have forgotten or are ignorant of the history of our country. I shall undertake to show very briefly that the proposed act which is now before Congress for its consideration simply follows the plan proposed by the first Secretary of War after the Revolution and the bill which was suggested by Washington to Congress in 1790. I do this at the risk of tiring the Senate, but I do it for the purpose of calling the attention of the country to the fact that Congress is now but following in the footsteps of the fathers of the Republic and those who are responsible for the liberty which we now enjoy.

The Secretary for the Department of War, Gen. Knox, who was a distinguished general of the Revolutionary War, on the 18th day of January, 1790, submitted to the then President of the United States, Gen. George Washington, a very learned report and the form of a bill for the reorganization of the militia of the country. President Washington, in a letter to the Senate on the 21st of January, 1790, submitted that report and recommendation of Gen. Knox to the Senate of the United States for consideration. I shall call the attention of the Senate to just a few selections from that report in order to show that these gentlemen, who had served in the Revolutionary War with distinction and who knew the dire needs of the times and of the dangers which surrounded the country during the Revolution, favored just exactly what Congress is now called upon to do by the President in attempting to bring to the standard of our country men between the ages of 18 and 45. There never was a truer statement made by any man than this statement which was made by Gen. Knox in the introduction to his report:

> A Government whose measures must be the result of mutiplied deliberations is seldom in a situation to produce instantly those exertions which the occasion may demand, therefore it ought to possess such energetic establishments as should enable it, by the vigor of its own citizens, to control events as they arise instead of being convulsed or subverted by them.

Measures that can only be attained as "the result of multiplied deliberations." From that time to this hour the Congress of the United States has been deliberating upon the question as to whether or not certain classes of our citizens should be called for military service and whether or not conscription or the volunteer system should be utilized in order to raise an army adequate to the maintenance of our liberty and of our safety. Further down in that report he says:

> If the United States possess the vigor of mind to establish the first institution—

That was the institution for training young men between the ages of 18 and 21—

> it may reasonably be expected to produce the most unequivocal advantages. A glorious national spirit will be introduced, with its extensive train of political consequences. The youth will imbibe love of their country, reverence and obedience to its laws, courage and elevation of mind, openness and liberality of character, accompanied by a just spirit of honor, in addition to which their bodies will acquire a robustness greatly conducive to their personal happiness, as well as the defense of their country, while habit, with its silent but efficacious operations, will durably cement the system.
> Habit, that powerful and universal law, incessantly acting on the human race, well deserves the attention of legislators—formed at first in individuals by separate and almost imperceptible impulses, until at length it acquires a force which controls with irresistible sway. The effects of salutary or pernicious habits, operating on a whole nation, are immense and decide its rank and character in the world.
> Hence the science of legislation teaches to scrutinize every national institution, as it may introduce proper or improper habits; to adopt with religious zeal the former and reject with horror the latter.
> A republic constructed on the principles herein stated would be uninjured by events sufficient to overturn a government supported solely by the uncertain power of a standing army.
> The well-informed members of the community, actuated by the highest motives of self-love, would form the real defense of the country. Rebellions would be prevented or suppressed with ease; invasions of such a government would be undertaken only by mad men; and the virtues and knowledge of the people would effectually oppose the introduction of tyranny.

Here Gen. Knox was discussing the advantages of a compulsory military system which he was proposing and was distinguishing between a standing army as it is generally understood and an army raised from the body of the people themselves. What does he recommend?

The following plan embodies the general outline of his proposal:

> First, that it is the indispensable duty of every nation to establish all necessary institutions for its own perfection and defense.
> Secondly, that it is a capital security to a free State for the great body of the people to possess a competent knowledge of the military art.

Mr. President, I call particular attention to the second paragraph, because in the course of the bill which was presented to President Washington and by him to the Senate of the United States Gen. Knox points out what that military training is to be and what the military art therein referred to means. It means the training of the young men from 18 to 21 and from 21 up to 45 years of age under a compulsory registration and system.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask if the service therein referred to was compulsory?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely; and, Mr. President, you could take that law which was proposed by Gen. Knox and the law which followed and was based upon it in 1792 and you would find that we had a compulsory military training system in this country from the earliest days of the Republic down to 1848, when New York, the first State in the Union to do so, proceeded to nullify the act of 1792 by a tax which was imposed upon the citizenship of New York, and to such as paid it exempted its citizens from the military service required by the act of 1792. I continue reading from Gen. Knox's report and plan:

> Thirdly. That this knowledge can not be attained in the present state of society but by establishing adequate institutions for the military education of youth, and that the knowledge acquired therein should be diffused throughout the community by the principles of rotation.

I call attention to this last clause because the act itself says what these educational institutions are. They are the camps in which the young men are assembled for the purpose of training. The remarkable thing about the act is that it makes the young men the vehicles for training the men in the community who are above 21 years of age.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon—probably confessing my ignorance of the very interesting document from which he is now reading—to state the standard of training and the time during which these men would be subjected to that training under the terms of that act.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I did not intend to go into the details of the act, but it provides exactly how long the young men should be trained, which was for a period longer than is applied to the other and older classes. Let me proceed a little further, and I may answer the Senator from Mississippi more particularly later, if I am not trespassing too much upon the time of the Senate. The report continues:

Fourthly. That every man of the proper age and ability of body is firmly bound by the social compact to perform personally his proportion of military duty for the defense of the State.

Fifthly. That all men of the legal military age should be armed, enrolled, and held responsible for different degrees of military service.

The very thing that the pending bill proposes and almost in the very language of the bill which was then proposed by Gen. Knox.

And sixthly. That agreeably to the Constitution the United States are to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such a part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States; reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

Mr. President, the plan that he proposed prescribed the ages of those from whom compulsory enrollment and service was due as follows:

The period of life in which military service shall be required of the citizen of the United States to commence at 18 and terminate at the age of 60 years.

And yet the Congress of the United States is now charged with dragging old men from their homes to be led to slaughter.

The men comprehended by this description, exclusive of such exceptions as the legislatures of the respective States may think proper to make, and all actual mariners, shall be enrolled for different degrees of military duty and divided into three distinct classes.

These are the classes:

The first class shall comprehend the youth of 18, 19, and 20 years of age; to be denominated the "advanced corps."

I call attention to the denomination of young men, because I am going to show a little later on that it was the young men who were to defend the country, while the older men were held in reserve.

Mr. KENYON. What were the ages?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Eighteen, 19, and 20 in the advanced corps.

The second class shall include the men from 21 to 45 years of age, to be denominated the "main corps"—

I presume under the pending measure those from 21 to 31, inclusive, would be designated the "main corps."

The third class shall comprehend, inclusive, the men from 46 to 60 years of age, to be denominated the "reserve corps."

All the militia of the United States shall assume the form of the legion, which shall be the permanent establishment thereof.

Mr. President, it was provided that—

The advanced corps—

That is, the young men—are designed not only as a school in which the youth of the United States are to be instructed in the art of war, but they are, in all cases of exigence, to serve as an actual defense to the community.

A little further down it is stated:

The youth of 18 and 19 years shall be disciplined for 30 days successively in each year, and those of 20 years shall be disciplined only for 10 days in each year, which shall be the last 10 days of the annual encampments.

Here are provided the schools, the educational institutions, which the young men are to attend. That answers in part the question of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That provides 10 days' training?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. A longer period than that for the younger, or advanced, class and 10 days for each of the older classes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There is no similarity between that particular measure——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield, but I should like to make at least the statement——

Mr. VARDAMAN. I started to ask the Senator if the measure to which he has made reference was really similar to the bill now under consideration?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I take the position that if you will lay them down side by side, while the language is different the principal features are so nearly alike that the pending measure may be said to be the offspring of the original report of Gen. Knox, because the bill now pending before the Senate provides practically nothing for which that measure did not provide.

Continuing the reading from the report:

As the main corps—

That is, the corps of men above 21 and up to 45—and reserved corps are to be replenished by the principle of rotation from the advanced corps—

They were to be supplied from the young men—and ultimately to consist of men who have received their military education therein, it is proper that one uniform arrangement should pervade the several classes. It is for this reason that the legion is established—

And so forth.

Mr. President, that is all of the act I care to read. It provided for an enrollment of the whole male population of the country from 18 to 60. The pending law provides for the enrollment of men between 18 and 45. The difference between the two is that the proposed statute does not go as far as did the plan proposed by Gen. Knox. Senators will find that report printed in the American State Papers, Military Affairs, volume 1, at page 6, and if it were not for its length I would ask to have it read into the RECORD, because the people of our country seem to be ignorant of the fact that the young men of the country 18 years of age, as well as those up to 45 or 60, have been looked upon as the dependence for military service of the United States since the earliest days of the Republic. That system was recommended not only by Gens. Washington and Knox and submitted to the Senate, but the principle was later recommended by Jefferson and Madison and other distinguished Democrats, and yet Congress is now charged with snatching from the cradle the babies to be sacrificed on the altar of their country, as well as dragging out the old men for murder, although following in the footsteps of the founders of our Government and of the author of the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the matter the Senator has read is of sufficient importance in connection with the subject under discussion that it ought to be printed in the RECORD as a part of the Senator's remarks without taking the time to read it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish it might be, but there has been so much complaint of the lack of print paper in these critical times that I do not like to ask to have it printed in the RECORD. If, however, the Senator asks that it be done, I will not object, for the country ought to see it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do ask it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the matter partly read by the Senator from Oregon be inserted in the RECORD. Is there objection The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator did not mean the whole report?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Just such part as the Senator thinks would be especially valuable in connection with this discussion. I have not seen the report, so I will leave that to the judgment of the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Very well.

The matter ordered to be printed in the RECORD, in addition to what has been read by the Senator from Oregon, is as follows:

It is for this reason the legion is established as the common form of all the corps of the militia.

The main legions, consisting of the great majority of the men of the military age, will form the principal defense of the country.

They are to be responsible for their proportion of men, to form an army whenever necessity shall dictate the measure, and on every sudden occasion to which the advanced corps shall be incompetent an adequate number of noncommissioned officers and privates shall be added thereto from the main corps by means of the sections.

The main corps will be perfectly armed in the first instance, and will practice the exercise and maneuvers four days in each year, and will assemble in their respective districts, by companies, battalions, regiments, or legions, as shall be directed by the legionary general; but it must be a fixed rule that in the populous parts of the States the regiments must assemble once annually and the legions once in three years.

Although the main corps can not acquire a great degree of military knowledge in the few days prescribed for its annual exercise, yet by the constant accession of the youth from the advanced corps it will soon command respect for its discipline as well as its members.

When the youth are transferred from the advanced corps they shall invariably join the flank companies, the cavalry, or artillery of the main corps, according to the nature of their former services.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The report of Gen. Knox is quite lengthy, and I have only read into or had printed in the RECORD such parts thereof as outline the plan for compulsory registration and service of all men of military age, just as is proposed in the pending bill for compulsory registration and service of those between 18 and 45 years of age.

The discussion did not end with the report of Gen. Knox. Congress proceeded to do what Congress has done ever since in opposing legislation for the creation of an efficient Military Establishment for the country. It is not with any bad motive that this has been done; it is because there is a mistaken idea in the minds of the people, and there is a difference among Senators as to what the traditional policy of the United States has been. I claim that the traditional policy of the country is that recommended by Washington and his Secretary of War, by many distinguished men in the public service since the Revolution, and particularly by men connected with the Military Establishment. It was the policy crystallized into law by the act of May 8, 1792, and followed down to 1848. If Senators are interested in the subject of how the States gradually departed from the plan laid down by the act of 1792, which was a compulsory registration and military service law, I call their attention to the hearings had in 1916 on the universal military training bill, S. 1695, page 725, where will be found the testimony of the distinguished adjutant general of New York, Gen. Louis W. Stotesbury, who discussed the subject and showed how New York established a plan for evading the compulsory-service act of 1792.

Mr. WATSON. What is the document?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The hearings on Senate bill 1695, which was the bill to provide for universal military and naval training of the citizen forces of the United States, pending in 1916 before the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate.

Mr. President, the discussion did not end with Washington's recommendations to the Senate in 1790, for in 1792 Congress enacted the militia law to which reference has been made. I am not going to read it, but I invite the attention of Senators to it on page 285, Revised Statutes of the United States, second edition, 1878. That law, Mr. President, was a universal military compulsory registration and service law, and it was never repealed by the Congress of the United States except by implication in 1903. Still those of us who have been insisting upon the ages of 18 to 45 have been charged with undertaking to enact a revolutionary statute which will drive the children and old men of the country to slaughter.

Yet we are simply following in the footsteps of all the fathers of this Republic who participated in the Revolution, and of later officials of the Government and distinguished officers who participated in every subsequent war.

I concede there are sentimental reasons against calling out young men of 18 for military service. In times of peace it might not be well to compel the young men to serve except for training and for short periods; it might not be well in times of peace to take them to serve for such periods as would interrupt their educational processes, but in times of war all must serve and all must make such sacrifices as are necessary to preserve our institutions and our liberties.

Section 1625 of the Revised Statutes, to which I have referred, provides that—

> Every able-bodied male citizen of the respective States, resident therein, who is of the age of 18 years, and under the age of 45 years, shall be enrolled in the militia.

Not "may be," but, mark you, "shall be."

Section 1626 provides:

> It shall be the duty of every captain or commanding officer of a company to enroll every such citizen residing within the bounds of his company, and all those who may, from time to time, arrive at the age of 18 years, or who, being of the age of 18 years and under the age of 45 years, come to reside within his bounds.

So that it was compulsory upon those captains to train all of these young men. That, Mr. President, was a compulsory registration and service measure, and the pending measure does not essentially differ from it.

Mr. WATSON. Was that act ever enforced?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That act, as I said awhile ago, was enforced, nominally at least, until 1848, when the States began to organize the State militia, out of which grew the National Guards of the several States.

Mr. President, I do not know that it is material to talk about the system that has been in vogue in our country for so many years, but in view of the objections which have been made to the pending measure I thought I ought to say something about that policy in this discussion. It will be remembered that voluntary enlistments at the age of 18 are permissible now, or were until a recent order was made, in the armies of the United States and in the National Guards, and many of the young men over in France now are between the ages of 18 and 21 years; and so it has been in the Navy and Marine Corps. I might say further, with reference to the recommendation of Secretary Knox—and this I forgot to mention—that boys of 16 who were actual mariners or seamen were compelled to train and serve. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] suggests there are over 200,000 young men in the Army of the United States now who are between 18 and 21 years of age.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. On that point the figures as I have them—and I think they are correct—are that there were voluntary enlistments in the Army up to June last to the number of 847,451; in the Navy, 307,210; in the Marines, 41,922; a total of 1,196,583. If the Senator will pardon the interruption—I do not desire to take his time—the number of those who were under 21 is not known; but I have a statement from Gen. Harris, Acting Adjutant General, to the effect that the average of a certain list taken at random shows that 77½ per cent of the recruits were under 21, and that another list of 7,000 papers shows an average of 60 per cent. If we were to average or compromise between these two figures, and put the figure at 70 per cent, we would have already serving over 700,000 boys under 21 years of age who enlisted voluntarily.

I was just examining this question when the Senator reached that point, and would not have mentioned it except that the figure of 200,000 was given. I think it is much too low; and while I do not absolutely certify to the correctness of these figures, I believe that they will be found substantially correct.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I saw the figures that the number of boys of 18 who had voluntarily enlisted in the Army was about 200,000—a little more than 200,000.

Mr. REED. I think the figures are grossly wrong; and to back up what I have said, I will introduce the letter of Gen. Harris at the proper time. I now call attention to the fact that in the late Civil War there were in the Army on the Federal side, of men under 18 years of age, 1,151,438, and of men under 21 years of age, 2,159,798; that these men constituted the great bulk of the Federal Army, which totaled 2,778,304. The fact is that the War of the Rebellion on the Federal side was fought by men under 21 years of age, and the majority of the men were under 18.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Missouri a question, with the consent of the Senator from Oregon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Those young men from 18 to 21 years of age were all volunteers, were they not?

Mr. REED. Absolutely; and those that are now serving are volunteers.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is exactly what I should like to see done in the case of all of the young men below 21 years of age. I should be willing to amend the law so that all young men, boys of 18 years of age and up to 21, should be permitted to volunteer, even against the wishes of their parents.

Mr. MCKELLAR. If the Senator will yield to me again I think there is no substantial difference between the figures of the Senator from Missouri and mine. The figures that I pointed out were from men between 18 and 19, and he pointed out those for men between 18 and 21. For just one year the number was about 200,000, according to the figures I have.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am very glad indeed to have the Senator from Missouri—who seems to have given the subject matter consideration—insert in the RECORD the figures as to the number of young men in the Army under the age of 21. There would be a great many more there if they were all permitted to go who want to do so; and there is no question about their fighting qualities or ability, nor is there any question about the zeal with which they go about the discharge of every duty. The best evidence of their endurance and their fearlessness was furnished by the Marine Corps in France recently, where these gallant boys added luster to our country's flag and new names to its roll of honor. The consensus of expert opinion on the subject is that men from 18 up to 21 make better soldiers than the older men, possessing as they do greater powers of recuperation and recovering more quickly from wounds and disease than their seniors.

Now, Mr. President, let us see what is the reason and what the necessity for changing the age limits of the selective-service act to 18 and 45 years. It is because we must get enough men to France to bring this terrible war to as speedy a conclusion as possible. It can not be hastened without men, and in order to get the men required for the proposed enlarged military program either the ages must be changed as proposed or the deferred classes must be invaded. Social and economic life will be disturbed less by changing these ages than by an invasion of the deferred classes. The reason for it, in short, is that America shall get to the front to play her proper part in this world war; for a piddling, pussy-footed policy of getting a few men over now and then simply means a prolongation of the struggle and the expenditure of millions of lives and of treasure.

What I would like to see would be an American Army on the battle front, under American officers, fighting under the American flag, and not brigaded with any of our allies. We sent them over so slowly at first—and I am not criticizing anybody for it, but I am just calling attention to the fact—that we did not have units large enough to have them fight under our own officers and our own flag, but we brigaded them with our allies. It was like associating the living with the dead, this taking of these young men, with all the life and enthusiasm that America can give, and brigading them with men who had been fighting for four long, tedious years. They could not, in the very nature of the case, have had that vigor and enthusiasm which they would have had if they had been permitted to fight under American officers and under the American flag.

We now have, in round numbers, a million and a half men in all, combatant and noncombatant, in France. We have a million and a half more in the United States, in the Philippines, in Hawaii, and at Panama, and at other places under the jurisdiction of the United States. The enlarged military program calls for more men than that. The enlarged program that has been mapped out by the War Department and the one that Gen. March says we are going to carry out, provided only Congress will help do it, is a 98-division program—80 divisions in France and 18 divisions in the United States. Eighty divisions in France means 3,200,000 men there. We have one-half that number, or a little less than one-half. It would amount to more than 3,200,000 when you take into consideration the corps troops and the Army troops that are not attached to divisions, not attached to corps, but are a part of the fighting force. It will take over 4,000,000 in France, according to the estimate of Gen. March, to carry out the present program; and he says—and I believe he is right—that if we had 4,000,000 men in France we could break through the German line at any point and at any time we pleased.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator how many men between the ages of 21 and 45 he thinks are available?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I will tell the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will look at the report which the committee has filed, he will find the whole subject discussed. He will find three studies prepared by the Provost Marshal General and grouped together under four headings the numbers of men that can be effective between 32 and 40, 32 and 45, 19 and 20, 18 and 20, and then between 18 and 45. The whole matter is grouped there and discussed at length. I will not take the time of the Senate to read these figures or to analyze them, but the Senator will find them on his desk printed in the report of the committee on the pending bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator how many of the million and a half men in the United States and the Philippines, and so forth, are in camps for the purpose of being eventually sent across and added to the one and a half million now in France?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Pretty near that entire number.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That means, then, does it not, that in order to bring our fighting forces up to the 4,000,000 point, which Gen. March thinks we should have, it will be necessary to raise 1,000,000 men more than we have now?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Still more than that.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator explain to me why more than that? There are a million and a half in France now. There are a million and a half here, being trained to go to France. When they are there, that will be 3,000,000. Gen. March says we should have, by June 30 of next year, 4,000,000; so that we need to raise, by this new draft, a million more. Is not that correct?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; if everything was going to remain in statu quo, which I hope might be possible. But the Senator is not making any estimate for a reservoir here or for wastage.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Of course, there is a wastage; but has the Senator any figures estimating the wastage?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. During the Battle of the Somme Great Britain lost 500,000 men. I do not think such losses will be sustained by the United States. I hope not.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is one fact that is overlooked by the Senator. The proposition is 4,000,000 men in France. That means substantially a million men in this country to be used as a reservoir, and the estimates include that; so that you must not speak of 4,000,000 men as enough to be raised, but 5,000,000. That accounts for another million.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, we have not men in the Army now, nor have we those in prospect who are registered and within the draft, but not called, sufficient to make up the program which was outlined to the committee by Gen. March and by the Secretary of War. There is some discrepancy in the testimony of Gen. March and Gen. Crowder as to the number of men now within the draft and subject to call between now and the 1st of January. Gen. Crowder maintained, when he was before the committee some time in June, if I mistake not, when the Army appropriation bill was under consideration, that we had enough men to last until the 1st of January if the then program were carried out for the calling of practically 100,000 or 150,000 men each month. Now Gen. Crowder claims that we have not enough to do that; that the men that will be called out under the draft will be practically exhausted by the 1st of October. I see that he is criticized in some quarters because of this apparent discrepancy in his testimony, but I think he is entirely free from any just criticism. He was right then, he is right now.

The New York Sun on the 7th of August criticized him for this discrepancy in his testimony. He was invited by the Sun to explain that discrepancy, and he did so in a letter to that paper, in which he said amongst other things:

"In your leading editorial of Wednesday, August 7, which I saw for the first time to-day, you called attention to an apparent inconsistency between two statements made by me in regard to the time when class 1 men would be exhausted in the draft. You first quote my statement made on June 10 before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs that 'we shall have practically exhausted class 1 by December 31 of this year'; and you then cite in contrast my recent statement in the memorandum to the Chief of Staff, published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 5, pointing out that on September 1 the 'estimated number of class 1 men under the present ages * * * will be only about 100,000 men, and may fall below that figure.'

"It must, of course, be conceded that the two statements are not identical in effect. The explanation is simple, viz, that the first statement was based on the information then available, and that the rapid developments of the last two months have been responsible for the discrepancy between the two statements. Since the date of the first statement several important items entering into the calculations suffered material and unexpected change.

"The first and largest item is attributable to the increase which developed in the numbers of men requisitioned by the Chief of Staff under the draft between the date of the hearing in early June and the 1st of August. The June calls, which at the time of my testimony before the committee were estimated at 283,000, increased to about 302,000; and the July calls, which were estimated at the time of the testimony at 290,000 (see p. 22 of the committee's report of the hearing), increased to 401,000, or a total increase of about 130,000.

"The second item of change arose from the developments as to the new age—21—registration of June 5, 1918; the number of effectives to be obtained therefrom had, at the time of my testimony, been estimated at 400,000, but by August 1 the developments of that registration obliged us to reduce the figure to 350,000, or a loss of 50,000 under the original estimate. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Aug. 5, p. 10019.)

"The third item is furnished by the estimate of additional class 1 men, under the original registration of 1917, to be obtained from the rectification of the classification process; this figure, in my testimony in early June, was placed at 200,000, but the developments of the next two months obliged us to reduce this figure to 125,000, or a loss of 75,000. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Aug. 5, p. 10019.)

"A fourth and large item is accounted for by the extraordinary figures of enlistments during June and July in the Navy and Marine Corps. The large calls to camp during May, June, and July were a surprise to the public, and when public attention was attracted to them it was perceived that the lower order numbers in class 1 were being rapidly approached. Moved by this prospect, large numbers of men within draft age immediately proceeded to exercise their election to enlist in the Navy or the Marine Corps. Just what this number amounted to in June and July I am unable at this moment to state exactly; the estimated number for May, June, and July together is 125,000, of which possibly 90,000 are to be attributed to June and July. There are also some other additional items of deduction which developed during those months, such as an additional 7,500 Emergency Fleet employees, and an especially large number of replacements of men rejected by the camp surgeons, estimated at some 60,000. The total of these and a few other items, which I need not stop to elaborate here, developing during the two months in question approximated 475,000 men.

"Applying this deficit to the expected calls for the later months, as set forth on page 22 of the committee report above mentioned, it is obvious that this shortage of 475,000 corresponds to something more than the 425,000 scheduled in June for the October, November, and December calls; in other words, the numbers that were expected to be ready to fill those three calls had disappeared and also 50,000 more out of the availables for the September call of 150,000, leaving only about 100,000 to fill the September call. That call itself by August 1 had been scheduled to be increased to 200,000.

"This, therefore, is how it came about that I was obliged to state in my memorandum of July 27, submitted to the Chief of Staff, and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 5, that 'the estimated number of class 1 men under the present ages will be only about 100,000 men (and may fall below that figure) on September 1, 1918, after filling the calls indicated for July and August and making deductions for the unexpected heavy losses due to a rush in June and July to the Navy, Marine Corps, and Emergency Fleet.'

"The inconsistency to which you refer is only such an inconsistency as develops in two months, when on the one hand the military conditions had led to unexpected increases in requisitions, and on the other hand the developments in the reservoir of men had led to unexpected shortages."

* * * * * * *

So that Gen. Crowder's figures were correct in both instances. I have found him so reliable in his statements to the committee in estimates which in the very nature of things could only be approximate that I believe his statement is correct now, that we must have more men by the 1st of October if we are to carry out this enlarged program.

It may be said, and it has been said, that we have more men in the United States in training now than we can ship over by the 1st of June, 1919, unless arrangements for transports can be continued as at present or increased. That is true; but we want these men to be drawn under this act and in training. The longer the training the better the fighting. Not only that, Mr. President, but the better care these young men will be able to take of themselves.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, I think he has inadvertently made a misstatement. Does the Senator mean to say that we have more men in training than we will be able to get over in June?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of next year?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We have in round numbers a million and a half men in training here, and the highest rate of shipment is about 350,000 a month. The testimony of Gen March——

Mr. REED. Surely the Senator is overlooking the testimony as to additional transportation that will be furnished.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We should look at the question of transportation facilities that may be withdrawn from present use.

Mr. REED. Of course, I may be in error, but my recollection is that there is sufficient transportation not only for the army that we have under the old draft but the army which we will have under the new draft.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator is probably correct in his statement that we have sufficient transportation arranged for to take the men we now have in training in the United States, but it must be remembered that we may lose a part of that transportation at any time. Most of the transports, if I recall correctly, belong to our allies and not to us. Great Britain has had to take her ships which she was using for her own purposes in order to accommodate the United States. Of course, it is accommodating her, too, because we are helping her in her struggle for a place under the sun.

It will be greatly against her interests to undertake to cancel any contracts she has with us for the transportation of troops, but she may be compelled by her own necessities to do it.

Let me call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to this: When Gen. March was before the committee, I called his attention to the fact that I had learned incidentally from what I believed to be reliable authority that we did not have dock space in France more than sufficient to unload cargo necessary for the troops we now have there. It was in that connection he said we not only had dock space, but had cargo space to care for the men there and those to be carried over under the enlarged military program.

Mr. REED. I want to get the Senator right or get right myself. One of us is obviously in error. As I understand Gen. March's testimony, it was that certain requests had been made to us for a certain program of troops, which I am not at liberty to mention; that as a result, it had been determined that we would raise 98 divisions, 80 to be placed in France by June 1 and 18 to be held in this country; that the additional transportation had been arranged to carry these troops and to carry the provisions to Europe and to provide the arms by June 1; and that that is the reason why we are asked now to raise this enormous Army. If it be true that this Army is not to be employed for eight or nine months and there is to be no transportation furnished for eight or nine months sufficient to carry over the additional force——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator? I did not mean to be understood as saying that we could not get the men over before June next.

Mr. REED. If the additional force we are about to raise can not be sent to France until after June—if we can not begin sending them until after that date—I think there is no excuse for drafting them at this time. I think on the part of the Senator or myself there is some confusion on this question.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am inclined to believe that the Senator is right and that I am mistaken about what the testimony was on this subject. I think there was some confusion at the hearing as to what we could do in the matter of the transportation of troops.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In just a moment. Let me finish answering the Senator from Missouri. I remember a discussion that took place between the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and Gen. March with reference to the very subject we are discussing, when Senator JOHNSON expressed the belief that in view of the reservoir of 1,700,000 we now have in the cantonments of the United States and our inability to get them over, there would be no necessity to raise additional men. I think it was in that connection Gen. March said we will be able to get them over, and also those who would constitute the enlarged military program. I recollect it now. The Senator from Missouri is right. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. The chairman will remember that he said we are sending 250,000 men a month. Of course, in 10 months that would be 2,500,000. That estimate also was based on the proposition that the rate would not be lowered but probably increased.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, the Senator from Florida has just stated that they made an estimate of 250,000 a month, and that in 10 months necessarily we could take over 2,500,000, but what proportion of those could be taken over by American bottoms? Is it not also true that our contract with the British Government to furnish British bottoms expires October 1, and is it not uncertain as to the quantity of British shipping that we can rely upon after October 1?

Mr. FLETCHER. My understanding is that that is all arranged for.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was the testimony of Gen. March that it had been arranged for.

Mr. McCUMBER. I notice that Lloyd George in a statement he made the other day expressed the view that we transported from this country in the month of July 305,000 men, of whom 185,000 were taken over by British ships, leaving only, of course, 120,000 who were transported by American ships.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will permit me, it will be remembered that while we use British ships to transport troops they are getting the benefit of our ships for cargo purposes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, according to the statement of the Secretary of War and of Gen. March and of Gen. Crowder, no matter which one of them makes a correct estimate of the number of men now subject to call under the draft, it will be necessary, in order to carry out the enlarged military program, to pass the pending bill, under the provisions of which there can be raised 2,398,845 men between the ages of 18 and 45. That number, added to the men now subject to call and those who are already in the service, will be sufficient for the purposes of the present military program.

The sooner we get these men over the sooner this war will end, and the sooner Congress passes this bill the sooner we will get the men in a condition to make efficient soldiers. Now, Mr.

President, I have undertaken to show why it is necessary to change the draft ages from those now established by law to those proposed in the pending bill. It must be done to raise the men necessary to carry out the enlarged military program.

Mr. President, I have taken a good deal of pains to find out how the selective-draft act and the volunteer system have operated since April, 1917, to July, 1917, both inclusive, and I have prepared a comparative table showing what has been done. I ask that the table may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Comparative table of operations of the selective draft and the volunteer system.

[1] First 5 months enlistments total 447,294; remaining 10 months total 400,157.
[2] Classification begun December 15, 1917.
[3] Enlistments opened to registrants already examined.
[4] Enlistments for April-July, inclusive, equal 48 per cent of total enlistments; enlistments for June and July equal 33⅓ per cent total enlistments.
[5] The selective system has produced 2,006,442 men in 11 months—the volunteer system 1,196,583 men in 15 months.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The foregoing table presents a comparative study of the selective and volunteer systems during the first 16 months of the participation of the United States in the present war.

Certain general features should be first noted:

(1) In the 11-month period, September, 1917, to July, 1918, the selective system has produced for the Army 2,006,442 men.

(2) In the 15-month period, May, 1917, to July, 1918, the volunteer system has produced for the Navy 307,210 men and for the Marine Corps 41,922 men.

(3) In the 15-month period, April, 1917, to June, 1918, the volunteer system has produced for the Army 847,451 men.

(4) The selective system has produced 2,006,442 men in 11 months and the threefold volunteer system 1,196,583 men in 15 months.

It will be noted that whereas war with the German Empire was declared in April, 1917, the mobilization of registrants under the selective-service law did not begin until the following September. An ebullition of military ardor and a resultant desire to enter the service always manifest themselves with the declaration of war and are expended within a comparatively short time. In the first 10 months of the Civil War the Union was able to place 632,000 men in the field as the residue of voluntary enlistments totaling over 1,000,000. But in the late spring and summer of 1862 the zeal for service had so far spent itself that the number of volunteers became practically nil in the face of military reverses and threatened disaster. As a result resort to conscription was forced in the spring of 1863.

The accompanying table illustrates an identical tendency in the present war. It will be noted that in the five-month period from April, 1917, to September, 1917, before the draft operations began, Army enlistments totaled 447,294, and that in the following 10 months the total enlistments amounted to only 400,157, including enlistments in the month of December amounting to 141,931. The explanation of December enlistments is given hereinafter. Excluding December enlistments, it appears that in the past nine months Army enlistments have totaled 258,226, as against enlistments of 447,294 in the first 5 months of the war.

In the case of enlistments in the Marine Corps, the first four months of its war-time recruiting netted 15,097. The succeeding 11 months, during the last 4 of which an intensive recruiting campaign has been prosecuted, have netted but 26,825 men. In other words, the past 11 months have produced but 11,000 more men than the first 4 months of the war.

It is therefore apparent that volunteering in combatant land forces is regressive and that the initial outburst of patriotism has steadily diminished.

Exactly the reverse is true of enlistments in the Navy. The initial rush to the Navy at the outbreak of war produced in three months 56,659 men, but with the exception of the months of December and January, hereinafter discussed, there was a comparative standstill in recruiting until April, 1918, when a veritable stampede for enlistment began. It will be noted that during the four-month period, April to July, 1918, naval enlistments amounted to 147,099 out of a total enlistment for the first 15 months of the war of 307,210 and that during the months of June and July, 1918, enlistments rose to 105,119 or more than one-third of the total for the entire 15 months.

The particulars of enlistment figures in the Army, Marine Corps, and Navy will now be examined in connection with the operation of the selective draft.

ARMY ENLISTMENTS.

It will be noted that the declaration of war caused an immediate rush to the Army. This was produced by two factors: First, a genuine desire for military service, as evidenced by over 200,000 enlistments in April and May, before the passage of the act of May 18, 1917, and secondly, by a desire to enter the service before the compulsion of the draft was exerted. It will be noted that the national drawing took place in July and that relative liability for service was then determined. A large number of registrants were thus assured against an immediate call to service. As a result, enlistments dropped off 16,000 in August and 56,000 in September, as against July returns.

During the months of September, October, and November voluntary enlistment in the Army was denied any registrant who had been called by his local board for physical examination. A sufficient surplus had been called and examined to fill all immediate demands of the draft. Hence those who had not been examined were, for the time, comparatively safe from the draft. It will be observed that enlistments for September, October, and November therefore fell rapidly.

On December 1, however, the privilege of volunteering was extended to those registrants who had been examined, authorizing their enlistment up to December 15. Enlistments for December thereupon jumped to 141,931, as compared with November enlistments of 45,699 and January enlistments of 41,225. It is indisputable that the sudden rise was created by the enlistment of those registrants who had already been examined and held for service and who exercised an option to enter voluntarily the service into which their compulsory induction was otherwise assured.

After December enlistments again fell rapidly, until the month of May, 1918, when the joint resolution of May 20 provided for the registration of all men who had attained the age of 21 since June 5, 1917. An immediate increase of 100 per cent over April enlistments is then observable in June, with a corresponding figure in May.

Briefly summarized, the statistics of Army enlistment show (1) a patriotic rush to the colors in the first four months of the war, and (2) a succeeding influx proportional to the pressure of the draft.

MARINE CORPS ENLISTMENTS.

The situation presented by Marine Corps enlistments is analogous to that of Army recruiting. First is noted the initial rush to service in May, June, July, and August. Then, with first quota contingents definitely determined, is noted a slump in September, October, and November, enlistments falling off in the last month to 617.

On December 15 a changed policy was adopted with reference to enlistment of registrants in the Navy and Marine Corps. Thereafter any registrant not within the current quota of his local board could enlist in the Navy or Marine Corps upon securing a release from his board. On the same date the new classification system became effective. A registrant whose order number had theretofore placed him far down on the liability list and who was then placed in class 1 became liable to call much earlier than he had anticipated. A corresponding increase in Marine Corps enlistments in December and January, amounting to 120 per cent over November enlistments, resulted in each month. The increase in Navy enlistments from the same cause, as hereinafter noted, was much more pronounced.

The following months of February and March show the poorest returns of the war. In April the Marine Corps began an intensive recruiting campaign, aided by its brilliant work on the western front. This drive for recruits has been pushed with increased vigor and with the widest publicity, yet it has resulted in the addition in four months of but 21,472 men. In the same period of time the Navy has recruited 147,099 men.

It is therefore apparent that the combatant features of Marine Corps service have not appealed strongly to the volunteer element.

NAVY ENLISTMENTS.

As in the Army and Marine Corps, the first four months of the war produced an abnormal flow to the Navy. But the first patriotic rush subsided in August, after the national drawing had taken place and relative liability determined. Naval enlistments fell off 50 per cent in this month. However, definite liability for service with the first draft contingents was not determined until late August. It thus appears that while enlistments in August fell off 50 per cent of July enlistments, nevertheless they amounted to 7,500. However, in September the personnel of the first draft was well settled and comparative assurance to remaining registrants accounts for a reduction in September of 50 per cent of August enlistments. Recruiting in October and November met with mediocre results.

However, on December 15 the new classification system went into effect, the results of which, in so far as changing the relative liability of registrants was concerned, have already been noted. Registrants with numbers placing them far down on the order of call found themselves suddenly transferred to positions of immediate liability. The classification continued during the months of December and January, when it was for the most part completed. The results are startling. In December and January Navy enlistments increased almost 400 per cent in each month over November enlistments, and the enlistments for December and January more than equaled enlistments for the entire six preceding months.

But it will be observed that the draft calls for December and January were the smallest of any months since the selective organization began operation. Hence panicky class 1 registrants became reassured and enlistments for February and March fell to 25 per cent of January enlistments. However, calls in March and April were large, and there appears a corresponding increase in Navy enlistments. In the months of May and June draft calls increased still more, and the bottom of class 1 came in sight. A tremendous increase in enlistments followed the prospect of military service. In the months of June and July the 1918 class became available and the class of 1917 was almost exhausted. A veritable scramble to secure enlistment in the Navy followed.

In the months of April, May, June, and July, 1918, when the heaviest calls were made and class 1 neared depletion, 147,009 Navy enlistments were accomplished, or 48 per cent of the total enlistments for 15 months of war. In the months of June and July, 1918, 105,119 men were enlisted, or over 33⅓ per cent of the total recruited in the whole war period.

It is thus evident that enlistment in the Navy has been in direct proportion to the imminence of compulsory military service.

Let me call attention to the totals shown by the foregoing comparative table, for they are instructive as showing the number of men in the service under the draft and volunteer systems.

Number called under the draft, 2,006,442.

Number of Navy enlistments, 307,210.

Number of Marine Corps enlistments, 41,922.

Number of Army enlistments, 847,451.

It will thus be seen that the selective system has produced 2,006,442 men in 11 months and the threefold volunteer system 1,196,583 men in 15 months.

I see my friend, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], here, who opposed the draft law at the time of its enactment. I believe he concedes with all of us that it is working all right and it ought not to be repealed now; but I think the Senator will admit that operations under it make a favorable showing as compared with the volunteer system.

Mr. THOMAS. I opposed the draft bill when it was before the Senate for consideration a year ago last May, and I voted against it; but, of course, I accepted the action of a majority, and I have done what I could to make the law effective ever since. I am not converted from my view regarding the virtues of the volunteer system, and I do not think that in the enforcement of the draft law the volunteer system should have been permitted at the same time. I think it has produced a great many inequalities that have resulted in some reflection upon those who were drafted instead of volunteering before they were called to the colors. But, of course, as the Senator says, this draft system is now the law of the land, thoroughly established, and I think it has been very well enforced by the Provost Marshal General. Of course, I shall do what I can now, as I have done what I could since the enactment of the system, to make it effective. Hence, I am in full accord with the requirements of the War Department as exemplified in this bill, which seems, from what the department tells us, to be essential at this crisis of the war.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator will not think that I am criticizing his attitude now.

Mr. THOMAS. Not at all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have the highest regard for the Senator, and there has not been anyone associated with the Military Committee who has been more zealous in his efforts to create an efficient Military Establishment. I am calling the Senator's attention to conditions under the two systems now, in order to try to convince him that the selective-draft system is preferable to the volunteer system, of which he was an able advocate.

It has been the history of every war that there is a point where the enthusiastic outburst of patriotism when the war first starts gradually wanes, and that every country that makes a successful fight, in the last analysis must come to some form of compulsion.

Mr. President, having briefly called attention to the exigencies that require the enactment of this law so far as the man power is concerned, I want to call attention to an amendment to the bill by the Senate Military Affairs Committee, which is known as the work-or-fight order, in the following language:

Provided, That when any person shall have been placed in a deferred or exempted class for any of the reasons in this paragraph set forth, he shall not be entitled to remain therein unless he shall in good faith continue, while physically able so to do, to work at and follow such occupation, employment, or business, and if he fails so to do he shall again become subject to the draft. The President shall make regulations for enforcing this provision.

Mr. President, there has been great protest against that provision, and I shall not permit it to be said that any of these protests which come to me as chairman of the Military Committee were not submitted to the Senate. Many of the labor organizations of the country, or rather the officers of these organizations, have telegraphed me protesting against the inclusion of this clause in the bill.

I have received 109 such telegrams, and I will ask to have the list of the senders of them printed at the end of my remarks, without setting them out in full, for they are substantially the same. Each of them comes from an officer of an organization stating that the organization to which he belongs represents memberships ranging from 10,000 to 100,000 or more.

But, Mr. President, I question very much if within the short time that this bill has been up for consideration before the Military Affairs Committee and before the Senate very many individuals of the membership of these organizations have been advised as to what this amendment is in terms or what it is intended to do. I am advised that other Senators have received practically the same telegrams.

Mr. President, it has been a physical impossibility for this provision to have reached the whole membership of these organizations in the United States. Some of the distinguished representatives of labor have been to see me, men whom I have known ever since my term in the Senate, men whom I respect, and as the representatives of their organizations they have given the reasons for their opposition to this legislation. Mr. President, I can not agree with them on this proposition, although I have been and am the friend of organized labor. But here is a situation different from any that has ever confronted us. The young men of our country are drafted into the military service. They go to the battle front of France and they are ordered by their commanding officer to face and march up against machine guns or the largest German artillery or some other form of death-dealing weapon.

Mr. THOMAS. Every.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Every form of hellish device that the enemies of the allies have been able to invent, and they dare not disobey the order.

Further than that, they are compelled to dig trenches, to bury themselves therein when occasion requires, working in the rain and snow and slush by day and by night, with spade and shovel and pick, and without sleep or food or rest for days at a time are compelled to go "over the top," exposing their lives whenever ordered so to do, and if they dare disobey, whether told to work or fight, they are subject to trial by court-martial and possibly to be shot.

These men, Mr. President, are working for the munificent salary of $30 to $75 per month. They have no choice but to obey. They must work or fight. They are dependent upon the ability of the industrial life of America to keep them supplied with the things that make it possible not only to dig in but to fight whenever they are ordered so to do. There has been and is no exemption for them from any service. They are the fighting force of America, the defenders of liberty and of civilization.

On the other hand, here in America are young men of the same age, raised in the same environment, educated at the same institutions, possibly, who have followed a different vocation from the time they were 14 or 15 up to the time they were of fighting age, skilled, it may be, in the manufacture of munitions, of guns, of ordnance, or in the manufacture of jigs and dies and gauges and things which are necessary for the Military Establishment of our country. They are exempted; they remain at home and are not to go to the battle front. I have no objection to that. They are just as much a part of the war service as the young men fighting at the front. I do not complain of that. Many of those who are engaged in this industrial work, many who have been engaged in manufacturing munitions and other supplies for the use of the Army, want to go to the front. They, as a rule, are patriotic, too, just as are the young men at the front, and they stay here for the purpose of furnishing the men at the front with things necessary to defend themselves. They are to be commended. But now, Mr. President, when one of these young men wants to stop he has the right to do so.

Nobody questions his right to stop. He does not have to work, but if he stops without sufficient cause he brings himself automatically within the draft. Suppose he wants to stop because he is dissatisfied with his condition, dissatisfied with his employer. It does not make any difference what he may be dissatisfied with. This bill only provides that he shall have his grievance determined through some of the instrumentalities established by law, but work in the meantime to maintain his brother on the firing line. Why should he not do it?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is not the substance of the committee amendment found in the original section 4, where it provides that no exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause thereof no longer exists?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is probably broad enough to cover it, but there was some question about it, and this amendment was proposed in the committee to remove the doubt and was adopted. It applies to all citizens, and it was not intended to interfere with organized labor. It goes further and authorizes the President of the United States to adopt rules and regulations governing the whole subject.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not have any objection to the amendment if I were sure it did just what the Senator has now stated. I have no objection to the principle of it at all; I am in favor of it; but ought there not to be something in the amendment that would provide for the settlement of any difficulty that might arise in regard to the wages or subject of employment, the law specifically providing for some tribunal by which that should be passed on?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think that is provided for now. I think ex-President Taft is at the head of such a tribunal.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, but is there any language in this amendment that would put it under the jurisdiction of that board?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The President would have the right to adopt rules and regulations which would compel that to be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be well enough to say that if they apply to that board under the present law, which they have a perfect right to do, there should be no strike until the decision of the board, and then if they struck after the decision was rendered, of course they would fall under the provisions of this law?

Mr. NORRIS. The point I wanted to make, if the Senator will permit me, is this: I would not want to put the men who might be affected by it under the arbitrary power of an employer who might not be disposed to be fair either in wages or in the conditions of work.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Neither would I.

Mr. NORRIS. I know the Senator would not. All I want to be sure of is that the provision is properly safeguarded. I think the amendment ought to specifically make provision for something of that kind, so that there could be no doubt about it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will make a suggestion that will cover the point he has in mind, it will be discussed when we reach amendments to the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I presented this morning a committee amendment to cover the very point suggested by the Senator from Nebraska. I am thoroughly in sympathy with my colleagues in the committee report, but I think the amendment would be more effective, it would be fairer, if it provided, as I have suggested in my amendment, that this proviso shall not apply in case of a strike if the strikers are willing to submit the dispute, whatever it may be, to a board designated by the President, and agree to abide by the decision of the board, and then abide by it. The difficulty with the Taft Board is that there is nothing compulsory about it, so that neither the employer nor the employee is absolutely bound to accept the recommendations of the board.

I think if a man will not work who is fit to work, he ought to fight if he is fit to fight, but I do not believe that he should lose his deferred classification simply because an unjust and arbitrary employer has made it impossible for him to work. If under those circumstances the striker indicates his willingness to allow his Government to decide the merit of the dispute and says to the Government, "I will abide by the decision and continue to work according to its terms," we would be at the same time protecting the Government and protecting the employees as well.

In that connection—because I shall present that after a while—I want to ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] also if they do not think there should be added, after the word "business," in line 9 of page, something like this: "or some other productive occupation, business, or employment deemed necessary under the act"? In other words, it would seem to me that if one who was placed in a deferred classification because his work was necessary should happen to lose his employment but should enter another employment just as necessary as the one from which he had come he ought not to lose his deferred classification; and I think he would lose it under the terms of the amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there is force in the Senator's suggestion and I will be glad to discuss it with him when we reach the stage of amendments. I do not care to discuss it at length now because I want to finish with my general statement about the bill. It was not the intention of the committee, at any rate, if a man left one occupation which was an essential business and went into another equally essential that he should lose his deferred classification, but possibly the bill is not broad enough to do the thing which the Senator wants.

Mr. President, I have taken more time than I intended, and I crave the pardon of the Senate. Because of the importance of this measure and because of some of the criticisms which have come to me, indicating clearly that the history of military legislation was not in the minds of the people who have sent me many of these protests, I have felt it my duty to discuss the bill at greater length than is my usual habit, and I thank the Senators for their patient indulgence.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Oregon allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. OVERMAN. I notice in the report of the committee that the number of males between the ages of 32 and 45 is 10,000,000, whereas the estimate under the proposed law is that out of 10,000,000 men we shall only have 600,000 effectives. How is that arrived at?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the report itself shows how that was arrived at.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have not read the report; I merely saw it on my desk; and I want to know how the estimate is arrived at that only about 6 per cent of the males between 32 and 45 are effectives.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the report has been printed at length in the RECORD and in addition to that a copy of it is on the desk of Senators. He will find on page 8 of the report just exactly how that number is arrived at. The report is quite long, and I will ask the Senator to read it instead of having it again printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD as an appendix to my remarks the names of the organizations from which I have received telegrams, without having the telegrams themselves printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Missouri begins, and before the Senator from Oregon concludes, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon a question which is rather fundamental in its character.

Mr. REED. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is material, as we come to review the man power of the United States, how large an army with our present man power can we equip and maintain in foreign countries and at the same time support our own population and successfully answer the demands which the allies make upon us for foodstuffs and the like?

I assume that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Chief of Staff, and all others who have surveyed the subject have made some estimate of that kind. I should like the country to get a fair idea of the size of the Army which it is possible for the United States to maintain in Europe and in other lands in which fighting is in progress, especially in view of the other demands which are made upon our productive capacity. I think this is the fittest time in the world to review that subject, because I think it presents the real justification for the "work-or-fight" maxim. If the Senator from Oregon has given thought to the subject, I should be very glad if he will tell the Senate what it is possible for the United States to do in the fulfillment of all the duties which this war has devolved upon us.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not know that I can enlighten the Senator from Iowa very much on that subject, because it is a very broad one. All I can say to the Senator is that the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff came before our committee and testified with reference to our ability from a transportation point of view with reference to troops and cargo as well. They stated that we could not only supply the Army which we had but the number of men we intended to take over to carry out the enlarged military program.

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will pardon me, I assume, of course, Mr. President, that in studying that question they must have studied the broader one to ascertain whether or not the maintenance of such a force in France would interfere with our ability to assist the allies and to support our own population. If they did not take that question into consideration, they are certainly not fitted to hold their jobs.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt about our power to maintain any such army as is proposed by Gen. March and by Secretary of War Baker. I want to know, and I think the country ought to know at this time while we are directing our man power into two great channels, what we really could do if it became necessary; and I am assuming, of course——

Mr. REED. I can answer the Senator that nobody knows; that nobody has made an estimate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I really asked the question of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire to suggest that Senators be kind enough to speak a little louder. I am very much interested in the subject they are discussing, but I can not hear them at all.

Mr. REED. I did not mean to interrupt.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand perfectly. I think what I ask can be known just as certainly as the number of men who would be required to be put into the battle fields of Europe next year. The country needs that assurance and needs some assurance that the great program upon which we are entering can be successfully carried to its end.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I arose for the purpose of speaking to the proposition of extending the draft so as to include young men 18, 19, and 20 years of age. As I proceed with discussion I intend to offer some observations upon the necessity of a much greater Army than is now contemplated.

It is time we should understand the magnitude of our task. I had occasion to remark the other day that there were many men who, when we entered this war, believed that a mere declaration of war by the United States would carry with it such a tremendous moral force that Germany would seek to make peace. I took occasion at the time to say on this floor that the war would not be won by paper declarations; that the only thing that would count would be men and metal upon the battle front; and that before this conflict should come to an end there would be blood upon the lintels of every American home. Yet I believe when we declared war a majority of the men voting for the declaration thought that it would be of very short duration, and that many of them never contemplated the sending of American troops overseas. The scales soon began to fall from our eyes. Representatives of the Government of Great Britain and of France and of Italy and of all the other allied powers appeared on the floor of this Chamber and informed us of the great necessity of sending reinforcements. It was a startling thing to us, but we may be sure that the worst was not then stated. Since that time we have witnessed the Italian disaster, the Russian collapse, and the conquest of Roumania.

Mr. President, I have heretofore put certain figures in the RECORD which I again venture to repeat. Germany to-day holds upward of 417,940 square miles of conquered territory. A domain over twice as great as the entire German Empire. The conquered countries contain an aggregate population of 70,000,000. Her foot is upon their necks; her saber is at their throats. She has acquired the oil wells of Roumania to supply that great want. She has captured the copper mines of Serbia and thus has replenished her vanishing store of that almost precious metal. She is to-day harvesting the crops of Russia. She has transformed these conquered lands into feeding grounds for her army. She will put into her service industrially the millions of these conquered countries. If we are not careful, prudent, and active, she will put millions of them into her battle line. When, therefore, we consider the number of men we must yet raise we must not ignore these facts, neither should we fail to acknowledge the fact that, even since American forces to the number of a million and a half have arrived in France, there is no considerable balance of man power upon our side. The probabilities are that the German, the Austrian, and the Turkish hosts upon the western front are equal to the forces of America and her allies. There is no use disguising these facts. There is no use indulging in vaporings and foolish boasting. There is no sense or patriotism in fooling the American people.

The other day I read in a Washington paper—and I refer to this by way of illustration—an article describing the glorious flight of three squadrons of American airplanes over the German lines 20,000 feet above the earth. As one read the two or three column description he would have imagined that the day had come for our supremacy in the air. But the official telegram which was the basis for the flamboyant article merely stated that 18 American planes of the De Haviland type had flown over the German lines and returned in safety. Nobody could determine from the telegram whether they had flown 10 miles or 20 miles or 1 mile; nobody could tell, except as the exuberant fancy of this patriotic writer might picture it, whether they were good machines or bad machines. I do not say that to criticize the writer or to criticize the paper, I only cite this instance as belonging to a type which is much in vogue. I venture to assert that we can not win this war by writing glowing accounts of battles won. We can only win it by gaining the battles, and we can only gain the battles by superiority upon the battle field.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I will simply call attention to the fact that the report to which the Senator from Missouri has referred was not limited to one paper, but a similar report was sent to a great many newspapers in the country and appeared in their columns the same day. So that the criticism can not be applied to one paper or to one writer alone, for it was evidently a matter of fixed and prearranged policy to embellish the dispatch in that extravagant way.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I did not intend to enter into that field more than to suggest the thought, but I pause long enough to remark that a policy of boasting has been indulged in from the first. To illustrate, columns have been written and material has been officially furnished—at least, it has been officially furnished if we can count the Bureau of Public Information as official—that have led the American people to believe that we had thousands of battle planes on the front months ago, and that we were then assuming the mastery of the air. Photographs have been furnished, and that stupid bureau has actually furnished as pictures of our fighting craft little "Penguins," which are machines that will not fly at all. All that I am pausing to protest now is that we shall get out of the realm of imagination into that of fact.

If, then, the present forces upon the western front are substantially equal, if Italy shall continue to hold her front, and if the status quo in Russia shall be maintained—which is about the best we can possibly hope for—what must we do to overcome the enemy? There is no use denying the courage and tenacity of the Germans. I read silly stories written by silly writers and sent to the American public to the effect that the spirit of the Prussians is broken.

Mr. President, the man who writes that sort of stuff to-day and sends it to the American people gives out false information that is of more service to the Hun than all his brood of spies. Let our people understand the facts. We must meet a foe, whether his motives be lofty or whether they be ignoble, that still has the ability to fight and still does fight and still does die in his place. Let our people know that they must bring the necessary men and the necessary armament to destroy the enemy. Let us not hold out the false hope that Germany is ready to surrender.

If we bring an army of the bravest of our allies and the bravest of our sons to meet this German Army, equipped, trained, and armed to the teeth, and if the two armies are nearly equal, the natural result will be that they will stand and fight and fight and still fight, until they will almost destroy each other. Put in this room a hundred men on a side, equally brave, and at the end of the contest probably 90 per cent will be killed or crippled. But put 150 men on one side and 100 on the other, and the probabilities are that there will only be a small percentage killed on the side that has the advantage in numbers. If, then, we would save the blood of our own sons we must create such a preponderance of men on the western front that we can take advantage of our enemies, break their lines, and destroy them without ourselves being annihilated.

I present this view now in connection with the drafting of the 18, 19, and the 20 year old boys. There are at the present time voluntarily enlisted in the Army, in the Navy, and in the Marine Corps 1,196,583 men. The best figures I have been able to obtain warrant the opinion that 70 per cent of them are probably under 21 years of age.

If so, we have now serving 933,578 men under the age of 21. No one can state whether these figures are absolutely accurate; they are the best I can obtain. We may therefore assume that nearly a million boys under 21 are already on the battle line or marching to the front. Their lives are already greatly jeopardized because they are being placed face to face with an enemy numerically equal and perhaps superior. If we permit that condition to exist, a very large percentage of these boys under 21 years of age will be killed or wounded. But if we put onto that field four or five million additional men we will break through the Hun line; we will capture his fortresses; we will destroy his army; we will return to this country with a smaller loss of blood than if our forces are only equal to the enemy. For the same reason we will come back with less boys under 21 years of age killed than if we continue to feed them slowly and gradually into the mouth of the monster—war. So that the logic of the case forces us to the conclusion that we must create an army large enough to be effective and decisive.

It is said that we take these boys from their mothers' arms. I am not sure but that I have used that expression myself; and the God who rules this universe knows that to take a boy of 18 from his father and his mother is something that wrings the heart of every man who contemplates the tragedy. But so, sirs, does it wring your hearts to contemplate the taking of the 19-year-old boy, of the 20-year-old boy, of the 21-year-old boy, or the taking of the father of the family, or the husband of the wife?

There is no such thing as stopping to consider human feeling in war, for war is inhuman and tramples upon all human feelings. If we were to consider war from that standpoint there never would be a war. If all the world would consider it from that standpoint—and it is the proper one—there never would have been a Hun mad with blood lust; there never would have been created a great war armament to destroy cities and devastate countries; there never would have been distilled poison gases to burn out the lungs of men; there never would have been created a submarine to lurk beneath the waves and assassinate peaceful ships; no one ever would have conceived so hellish a thing as an explosive shell; no fiend would have thought of raining death from the skies upon sleeping women and tender babes. If there had been no devil there would be no evil. If there had been no Kaiser there would be no war, and all the world would be living in peace and harmony. But there is a Kaiser, there is a war, and war obeys the law of necessity. It acknowledges the supremacy of brute force. It is cruelty incarnate. It is justified in us because we stand to defend ourselves, to defend humanity, and to make home and liberty and Republic safe. Because of these reasons we are justified in calling the father from his family, the husband from his wife, the son from the arms of those he loves.

The question that confronts us to-day is not one of what we desire, but of what we must do. We did not create the German Army. We did not create the German Navy. We did not set in motion this machinery of diabolism. We did not point these bayonets of autocracy at the bosom of Liberty. We did not inspire Germany with a desire to conquer the world. These sentiments she herself cultivated, and we find ourselves to-day confronted by their results—the armed forces of Germany. They are firing upon American soldiers in France; they are sinking American ships within sight of New York.

How can we meet this condition? Our allies have called upon us for a larger army than we are proposing to furnish. It has been agreed that we shall furnish at least 98 divisions; that 80 shall be in France, and that 18 shall be in this country to fill the gaps when made. Such is the present demand. It is proposed to land the 80 divisions in France by the 30th day of next June.

So that there may remain no doubt regarding the purpose of our war chiefs, I read a paragraph from Gen. March's testimony:

> We have divided up the difference between our present strength and the 80 divisions next June so as to send over a proportionate number of divisions each month, so that on June 30, 1919, we will have in France 80 divisions of troops, and the amounts per month vary from 6 divisions going to an average of about 5 divisions a month for the whole year. The number will go down in the winter when the conditions of shipping and coal are more difficult, increasing in the spring to a sum total of an amount that will bring 80 divisions in France by June 30, 1919.

In order to provide this shipping, our allies must strip themselves to the very bone. We must continue to increase shipping as fast as possible. In order to maintain these troops, our allies must undergo great hardships and continue to undergo them until our new ships shall be sufficient so that their vessels can be released to resume their usual business.

Mr. President, the figures show that if we raise this body of men, we must go into the classes below 21. If we should take only the men above 21, what would happen? We would enter the industries; we would take our skilled workmen; we would destroy our creative capacity. That creative capacity is as essential as the Army itself. It must be maintained by us in an unusual degree, because of our great distance from the battle line.

The figures as prepared are that if we should take every man we can above 21 years of age and under 45 and yet leave the industries of the country in full vigor, we would only secure, in round numbers, 600,000 men, in addition to those in class 1 of the present draft; but if we go to the ages between 18 and 21 we will get 1,797,609, making a total of 2,398,845 men. All of these are necessary if we raise an army of the size agreed upon.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think the Senator inadvertently made an inaccurate statement. I understood him to say that if we should take every man we can get above 21 up to 45 we would get, in round numbers, 600,000. The Senator meant, did he not, above the age of 32 and up to 45?

Mr. REED. I meant from 32 to 45. I assume that we have already taken all of the men between 21 and 32 in the first classification——

Mr. POMERENE. No, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. And I have already discussed the proposition of entering the other classes; and I pause now for a moment to elaborate that a little.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may do so, in connection with the statement made by the Senator from Delaware, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that Gen. March, the Chief of Staff, in his testimony says that they have 550,000 men from whom to take the quota required for the August draft and for the September draft; and that will still leave, if those figures are correct, 80,000 men to apply toward the October draft.

Mr. REED. I think I catch the thought which the Senator has in mind. I am not sure. But after we have exhausted the present draft, in order to make up the full-sized Army that we are proposing to raise and have in fact agreed to raise, we will still need all of the men between 32 and 45 and all of the men between 18 and 21, in addition to those between 21 and 31 who are in class A, but who have not yet been drafted. I am assuming that the same exemptions will be allowed as heretofore.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I am very much interested in his argument. I recognize the fact that the statement of the Chief of Staff is to the effect that we shall need all of those men; but I think we can demonstrate by his own testimony that it is not necessary to go into the 18-year class.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am about to dwell on that subject. I assert, in my humble opinion, that before you get through with this war you will find that you not only have to take all the 18-year-old men, but you will have to invade the deferred classes, and to a very large extent; but of that I shall speak a moment later.

One reason why we are obliged to keep an unusual proportion of men in the industries is because we are so far from the seat of conflict. An army fighting in proximity to its own base of supplies probably would not need to maintain among its noncombatants one-fifth of the men we are obliged to so employ. Let me illustrate that.

If a farmer in France were to slaughter a beef for the Army and it had to be moved 50 miles to the front the transaction would be soon over. The labor of carriage would be small. But if a ranchman in Wyoming has a steer that we are to use for the Army it must be transported over something like 3,000 miles of land and then across 3,000 miles of sea. All the cars and all the steamships and all the men and all the energy and all the brains that it takes to move that steer that 6,000 miles is practically in excess of what would be required to move the French animal the 50 miles to the front, because after the American steer has reached the shores of France it still must be moved farther than the French steer of my illustration.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. It was said last year—and the Senator's statement reminds me of the fact—that it costs the United States for the maintenance and equipment of 1 soldier what it costs Germany to equip and maintain 14.

Mr. REED. Exactly. It has also been stated that an army could be maintained and kept upon the French front—an army of a million Frenchmen or a million Americans, if they happened to be living in France—for one-tenth of the amount it costs to send an army from the United States and to sustain it.

Let me give you another illustration of why it is necessary to employ so large a force back of the lines and why it is impossible to send as large a proportion of our people to the battle front as we could send if we were close to the field of action. Consider the matter of transportation. We have literally robbed the steel mills and the iron mines of this country in order to get steel to build our ships. We have taken labor by the hundreds of thousands from all parts of the country and transported them to the shipyards. We have sent vast quantities of provisions to them. We have mobilized about one-third, it seems to me—perhaps that is an exaggeration, but at any rate an enormous percentage—of all America's industries back of the mere building of ships, and we have hardly begun our task. Yet not one of those ships would be necessary if we were already on the other side. So that this long line of communication must be maintained. Everything we carry to France must be carried these enormous distances, and it all takes time and labor and expense. In the end it all absorbs the energies and power of our Nation.

The result of that, Senators, is when we come to maintain our Army we must keep a larger proportion of our able-bodied males in the industries than we would be required to keep if we were closer to the battle front. We are required to do this because the moment we fail to do it our Army will go to pieces at the front. We are therefore forced to put in these exempted classes—classes of skilled labor, managers of business, agriculturists, etc.—a much larger percentage than France or England finds necessary.

Besides that, we have another task. We are obliged to produce in vast quantities for the consumption of our allies. Before this war began we were furnishing them large amounts of metal and war materials; and now that the war is on that work still continues and will further continue and increase until the war is at an end.

This brings us, then, to this proposition: We can not take from our industries the men that are there. We can not take from agriculture many more men. We can not take the managers of great plants, because the plants must run. Where, then, are we to get the necessary 98 divisions? I challenge anyone to find any other satisfactory answer except that we must take the boys from 18 to 21.

Mr. President, how much of a hardship is that in the long run, when it is properly understood and fairly considered?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to ask the Senator a question. Of course, about 600,000 of these troops can be obtained, after making all allowances for the transportation and production to which the Senator refers, from the classes from 32 to 45. Is not that correct?

Mr. REED. Yes; that is the figure. But 600,000 troops will not create that balance of power which it is necessary to have in order that we may bring this war to a speedy close.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I quite agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. REED. Yes; the Senator's correction is eminently proper. I did not intend to omit it.

Now, Mr. President, let us see how much of a real hardship there is. Of course, all war is a hardship. Of course, the taking of the flesh and blood of mothers in the form of the sons, to whom they gave birth, is a heartbreaking proposition; but let me repeat the figures I gave a few moments ago.

In the late war on the Federal side, under 15 years of age, there were 104,987 soldiers, every one of whom volunteered.

There were, under 16 years of age, 231,051 soldiers, every one of whom volunteered.

There were, under 17 years of age, 844,091 soldiers, every one of whom volunteered.

There were, under 18 years of age, 1,151,438 soldiers, every one of whom volunteered.

There were, under 21 years of age, 2,159,798 soldiers.

Of those who were 22 years and over, there were only 618,511 troops.

The War of the Rebellion was fought upon the Federal side by men of the same ages as those who are to be included in the proposed draft below 21 years of age. It was a war of volunteers. You were told, when the question whether we should have volunteering or drafting was under consideration, that the objection to the volunteer plan was that it took the bravest of the brave; that it skimmed the country of its courage, its brains, its brawn, its energy, its heroism. That argument won here. Yet, as I turn back and scan the page of history and look at the cold figures, I find that that heroic host that saved this country and rebaptized our flag, that kept us one Nation, was chiefly composed of the boys from 21 years down. The men older who entered, I suspect—and I do not say this in any way to reflect upon them—were chiefly officers. If, then, mothers could voluntarily yield their sons in the great rebellion, and if they went in response to the call of duty, and if already, under the adverse conditions created by the present system of raising armies by draft, we have nearly a million boys under 21 years of age who have volunteered; and if they are already in the camps and in the trenches and on the red line, why should we hesitate about saying that others of like ages should, in this awful crisis of the world's fate, be permitted likewise to serve?

I hear talk about "taking babes from their mothers' arms." Let me describe a few of these babes.

The marines, all volunteers; the marines, that were the first upon the battle line; the marines, that went over the trenches with cheers upon their lips; the marines, that the officers could not hold back; the marines, that wrote a page deathless of glory in the bloody history of the latest battle of the Marne; the marines are 70 per cent composed of these "babes." Splendid, gallant babes they have proven themselves.

And the Regulars—the Regulars, who were thrown against the German breastworks with scant preliminary training; the Regulars, who at the command sprang forward like tigers unleashed, anxious for the contest, unafraid, resistless; the Regulars, who unflinchingly charged nests of machine guns and batteries of cannon, and with the cold steel of their bayonets taught the Hun that the courage of freemen is superior to trained brutality; the Regulars, were they not 60 per cent boys under 21 years of age, babes of whom we hear so much?

The National Guard—all volunteers; the guard, many of whose numbers are boys under 21; the guard has held its share of the line and charged beside the veterans of France and England. Who has said that the lads have not kept step with the men; that the boys have not proven themselves supermen?

The American soldier—his is a glorious story; and yet it is the story of the boys under 21 years of age. In every war the boy has been the first to enlist. In every battle he has led the charge. In every victory his hand has held the banner as it was carried through smoke and carnage to glory. In every defeat he has been the last to quit his gun, the readiest to die in his tracks, and upon the plains of Europe he will again prove that courage is the heritage of youth, that glory is the guerdon of the young, that the fires of patriotism glow warmest in the hearts of those who behold life through eyes that are undimmed by age, experience, and pain.

But, Mr. President, I desire to invite your attention to a broader field. I know that it is an act of temerity to go beyond the present war plans as published and to express my humble opinion, and yet, sir, the fact that there is not a theory of the trained soldier that has not been modified in this war gives me courage to speak boldly. I do not say that in harsh criticism, for what mind is there that could visualize this world conflict when it was first begun? Nay, more, there has not been a military chieftain in all the world who has not been compelled to constantly enlarge the horizon of his vision to take in new fields and to attempt a solution of unheralded problems.

Accordingly I unhesitatingly say that we must not be content with raising an Army for France. To my mind it is absolutely suicidal to allow Germany to exploit and absorb the vast riches in man power, in money, and in material that lie yonder in Russia. It is insanity to allow this thing to continue. From the first I have been of that opinion. We had a solemn understanding, England had a solemn understanding, France and Italy had a solemn understanding with Russia that she would make common cause with them, and that they would stand together and battle until victory would come or the war should be ended by mutual agreement. A part of the Russian people broke that pact. There were weeks and weeks when negotiation was going on between those who were breaking faith with us and breaking faith with the world and breaking faith with their own people and trying to sell their nation and trying to sell us to the unspeakable Hun, and we sat here silent trusting to the honor of the bolsheviki.

In all the history of the world there is no chapter I ever read which was larger branded with the word "incompetency." We should have at that time said to that part of the Russian people who we believed wanted to keep faith, "We come to your rescue. Hold fast and we will be by your side." If they intended to remain our friends they would have welcomed us with open arms. But if they were at heart our enemies and intended ultimately to go to the side of the German, then we would at least have had a chance to have saved a part of the munitions and a part of the guns we ourselves and our allies had generously furnished them. And we could have asked Japan to see to it that Russia should not be absorbed by Germany.

But there was then, there is now, an enormous element of the Russian people who do not want their country disgraced, who do not desire the German yoke, who would willingly join with us and with the English and with the French and with the Italians and with the Japanese.

I say to you that Russia, if she be possessed to-day of any sanity, would accept the joint guarantee of England, France, Italy, the United States, and Japan; that a Japanese Army and the allied army will leave Russia free and all her territory unimpaired, rather than to trust to the treacherous Hun, who is already ravishing her domains and drinking her lifeblood.

The field that lies yonder must be occupied. I unhesitatingly say that we will commit the tragic mistake of this hour if we do not occupy it. An army of 500,000 Americans, properly officered and manned, in Russia will produce one of three consequences. It will either be welcomed by the Russians and joined by the Russians, in which event it will soon become invincible, or the Russians will ignore it and ignore our enemy and allow us and Germany to battle over Russian territory, or Russia will unite with Germany against us. An army of 500,000 troops unopposed by Russians, except those that are allied with Germany and who are already lost to us, can keep an army of two and a half million Austrians busy, and they will not be free to help the Germans upon the western front.

But let us assume that Russia will refuse this help and that Russia will rise up against us, then I say that is a complete and absolute demonstration that Russia is already Germanized. Still in that case our troops and the troops of our allies should be there to thunder at the back door of Germany and to compel her to keep her armies in Russia to meet this force of ours, and we could keep that force far enough from the front so that Germany would never be able to capture or overwhelm it.

I would not stop, sir, with such an army as that. I venture the prediction to-day that if the ships can be built fast enough within 24 months from this time, if the war lasts that long, and it will, the allies will be obliged to put an army of a million to a million and a half men in Russia. I believe if that is done Russia will join our forces and that Germany will then be compelled to divide her forces. If we do not do this we will be in danger of finally meeting, upon the battle line in France, Germany and Austria with large contingents recruited in Russia.

If Russia is already so inimical to us that she will turn against us because we come to her rescue, because upon her soil we attack her oppressors, then I say she is irrevocably lost, and we might as well know the fact.

Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will give this serious consideration. If we are to raise an army for Russia, then our task is not to put 4,000,000 men in France with a million in this country, but our task is to raise 6,000,000 or 7,000,000 men, to arm them, to equip them, and to transport them. This war is not to be over in a day. Make no mistake. We can not have our armament complete under 22 months from this date, and I know whereof I speak. The army proposed by the present bill can not be landed in France until 11 months from this date.

It will then take time to place that army in conditions of efficiency. There will be necessary delays. There will be the waiting for transportation, the waiting for munitions, and the waiting for armaments. These things are inevitable; our enemy will not be at leisure. He will not be asleep. He will be on guard and will be harassing us at every point.

So, in my opinion, it will be 18 months at least before this army can all be sent to France and all utilized as a great fighting force. Then what? We will be obliged to drive the Germans back from France. When that is accomplished we will encounter chains of German fortresses and an almost invincible network of trenches. We will be met with all those devices that the highest military engineering skill in the world can create; we must then batter our way slowly and steadily forward until at last we shall wear down the great German fighting machine. It will take time. And as we wear down the machine in the front, we must see that it is not recruited from the rear, from Russia, from Roumania, from the conquered countries.

Mr. President, the task we are upon is not one of a month or a year. It will require more than the boys of 18 or 19. I said the other day, and I repeat now, that the women of this country will be obliged to do what they are doing in France, to enter the factories and many of them must enter the fields; that children barely beyond the tender years will be compelled to take up the dreary tasks of labor; and old men who have long since laid aside the implements of toil will be compelled to resume their tasks. Our people will be forced to undergo hardship and privation in order that this mighty giant we call America, by straining every nerve and every muscle, may at last achieve a world victory. That victory will come, but it will be at the expense of every energy, every power we and our allies can muster.

We may as well understand these truths. We may as well face the grim facts. I do not hesitate to present them. Game men always look their enemies in the eyes. A game race of people only prepare the better for the struggle when it knows the struggle is to be desperate. Only cowards bury their heads in the sand and seek to escape the actualities of life. Tell this American people, as brave as the bravest of this earth, that they may as well begin to prepare for a struggle that will be long, that will be bloody, and that will be bitter. Tell them so that they may nerve themselves for the ordeal. Tell them so that they may rebaptize their souls in the fountains from which the fathers of the Republic drew their inspiration in the dark days of the Revolution. Tell them the truth. That truth is that we must take the boys, we must take the men, we must call on the women, but that in the name of God and liberty we will win the victory.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The Chair is informed that the committee amendments have not yet been considered.

Mr. KIRBY. The amendment may lie on the table. I wish to speak briefly to it.

Mr. THOMAS. Let it be read.

Mr. KIRBY. I ask that the amendment may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Amend by striking out the word "eighteen" in line 3, on page 2, and line 6, on page 5, and inserting "twenty," and by striking out the word "eighteenth" on page 4, line 22, and inserting the word "twentieth."

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I have listened with much interest to both the speeches that have been made in favor of this bill. I agree with the most of the things that have been said. But there is one thing that must be conceded, and will be by all, and especially after the dissertation of the learned Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. That is that this is a man's size war. This is a man's size job. Nobody, I think, in the United States will question that statement. Why not then expect our men to enter the Army? Why require our boys 18 years of age to do the fighting.

Now, it comes to us to determine what number of men we shall raise and what additional army we shall put in the field yonder in France. It has been determined by our military department, the General Staff, and the Secretary of War that we ought to have 4,000,000 men in France as soon as they can be transported there, and that ought to be supplied with a reservoir of at least 18 divisions of 40,000 men each in camps here.

What is the condition? We have 1,500,000 men in France. We have 1,500,000 men in camps in America. We still have 580,000 men in class 1 in the present draft. There are 750,000 men in the second registration and about 100,000 registering monthly. We have in this bill 601,000 men above 31 years of age who are proposed to be put in class 1, which provides more than the 5,000,000 men needed without taking into account the 600,000 fit for service 20 years of age.

What is the necessity now which requires that any man under 21 years of age shall be drafted? We have had some review of ancient and time-honored documents here that are supposed to contain wisdom because of their coming down from antiquity. We have been regaled and informed by the reading of the reports of the War Department of 100 years ago about the kind of men and the class of men and the condition of men who ought to be put into the Army and the service they were expected to perform. I am going to read briefly from Holy Writ, a more ancient and authoritative source, of the first great registration and the age that was therein suggested and approved. I read from Numbers, the first chapter:

And the Lord spake unto Moses, in the wilderness of Sinai, in the tabernacle of the congregation, on the first day of the second month, in the second year after they were come out of the land of Egypt, saying:

"Take ye the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel, after their families, by the house of their fathers, with the number of their names, every male by their polls.

"From 20 years old and upward, all that are able to go forth to war in Israel; thou and Aaron shall number them by their armies."

And it was accordingly done. This registration was under the guidance of the Lord God of Hosts when He was in closer relation, in more direct touch with the chosen people, than He is supposed to be with our great Nation, and that people matured earlier in that climate than ours do.

That was the first great registration for a draft. The men were registered 20 years old and upward who were able to go forth to war.

When we started into this war we said our men shall be registered from 21 years and upward to 31 years, all that are able to go forth to war. What was the result? With the number of men who have already been sent to France and the number of men in camp in this country to-day, and the thousands in class 1 not called, besides those in the second registration, there are still six and one-half million men in deferred classification who are able to go forth to war who have not yet been called in the ages between 21 and 31 years.

Will not these men make as good soldiers as the men yonder on the battle front? Yea, verily. I call your attention to what the Chief of Staff said relative to that question. I might read several excerpts as well now as at any other time from Gen. March's testimony. He stated:

The figures which were given to us at that time by the Provost Marshal General as to the available man power under the then existing draft law would not provide the men for the program that we had under consideration, and the desire of the administration was to establish limits, both maximum and minimum, which would accomplish what we were after and at the same time disorganize the industries of the country as little as possible. (R. 23.)

* * * * * * *

The policy of the War Department now is, and has been ever since I had anything to do with it, to put the maximum number of men in France that we physically can, with the idea of shortening the war to the greatest possible extent. (R. 24.)

* * * * * * *

In order to raise the men for this proposed program the Provost Marshal General, after a prolonged study of the man power of the United States, furnished us figures which showed it was necessary to drop the figures to 18 years of age and to go to 45 in order to get the men to carry it through. We thereupon directed him to prepare a bill for submission to Congress which would embody two things, one a change of the limits of the draft age from 21 to 30 to 18 to 45. (R. 24.)

* * * * * * *

Senator KIRBY. The number of men contemplated to be organized into an army can not be raised under the old program without taking some of the deferred classifications?

Gen. MARCH. That is exactly so.

Senator KIRBY. You have got over six and a half million men registered in the present draft who are in other classes than class 1?

Gen. MARCH. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. How many men in round numbers do you expect to raise under this bill?

Gen. MARCH. We expect to raise, in addition to what we have available now, 2,300,000 men and odd.

* * * * * * *

Senator KIRBY. There is no reason from a military standpoint, or a point of physical fitness, why the men between 21 and 31 years of age out of these 6,000,000, or why 3,000,000 of them could not be put into the Army, except their dependents?

Gen. MARCH. There is no reason beyond that.

The CHAIRMAN. They would not make as good soldiers.

Senator KIRBY. They would make as good soldiers, would they not?

Gen. MARCH. Absolutely so. (R. 38.)

That was the testimony of Gen. March, now Chief of Staff, before the Military Affairs Committee. Before he got to that part of it he said in discussing this matter:

Gen. MARCH. It came up when it became perfectly evident that we could not carry through the program—

That is, the changed program—that I proposed on the present draft limits without going to the other classes. I told Gen. Crowder at that time that I would not hesitate at all to go into any class to get the men necessary.

That is the condition so far as we are able to gather it. We know that these men will make as good soldiers as have ever carried a rifle upon any battle field in the world. We know that there are six and one-half million of them in these deferred classifications. We know that there are 4,500 draft boards that had no idea on earth when they put a man in the deferred classifications that for every man put in such classification it would require the taking of an 18-year-old boy off the farm or out of school to go to France to fight in his stead. They were classified under that sort of a condition, and I believe to-day that 2,000,000 soldiers can be procured from these deferred classes who are already registered without seriously disturbing industrial conditions.

Then what is the necessity for going below 21 years? Our armies in France have suffered no reverses and no serious losses. It is said that boys fought in the Civil War at 16, 17, and 18 years. That is true. It is said that there are already more than a million of boys under age now in the Army who volunteered. That is also true; but because these boys have responded nobly to the call of their country in her time of need, is it any reason for putting all the other boys in the war? Why not let them be fairly considered when we go to drafting the man power of the country to complete the Nation's fighting force?

There were many boys in the Army of the North; and viewing it dispassionately from a long time in the past—I was born after the war closed—that may be the reason why the South whipped the North for three years, because there was nothing but boys in the Northern Army. But whatever the reason, this other condition is here.

Now, taking the men from 31 up to 45, there are twelve or thirteen million men in that division, and you propose to take only 601,000 out of the 13,000,000, and you propose to take these other hundred thousands out of this other number, and you propose to take about 2,000,000 boys of the number between 18 and 21 years after 1,000,000 have already enlisted in the Army. That is the thing which is proposed here, and why? We need more men in the Army. Yes. These boys are no braver, they are not so discreet, and make no better soldiers than the men. Then why excuse 13,000,000 men and take 2,000,000 boys under 21 years of age? That is what is proposed to be done. About 18,000,000, in fact, are to be exempted from service. Why should it be done?

Most of us believe that the educated mind of its people is the Nation's best asset. Most of us know it is the best asset of the individual, and all of us know that boys of 18 years of age have not even finished their high-school education. All of us know that of the boys 19 years of age not one-third have finished their collegiate education, and what opportunity will they have to finish this education? They can not educate their minds and brains for their own individual benefit and the benefit of the Nation, if they must be taken now and put into the Army across the seas. And not one in thousands will ever again attend school after returning from such service.

It seems to me that there ought to be an element of fairness in this thing. These boys have never been able to vote. They are not allowed to vote now. They can vote neither for nor against any man who favors putting them into the draft or who favors keeping them out of the draft. They can not vote at all; and it seems to me that is one reason, compelling and imperative, why they should have a fair deal when it comes to imposing the military burdens upon the man power of the Nation.

Let us see a little further. We have shown how many men there are in camp, how many across the sea, how many in class 1, and how many in these other classes from which it is proposed to raise troops.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] makes a gloomy picture about the duration of this war. He may be right about that. I am not going to discuss the Russian condition here to-day, but I am going to talk about the thing that is before us now. The Chief of Staff said unless this bill is passed they will invade the deferred classes; that we need the men; that we will get the men and put them on the fighting front. What are you going to do to provide the next 3,000,000 men when this proposed draft is exhausted or when a larger army is required?

I am going to digress here just long enough to agree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] about the change which has come over the mind of the Senate and the people of this country about the magnitude of this undertaking since going into the war. When the preliminary steps were taken and declarations made before war was declared I had a fairly good view, I think, of what the condition would be, and other Senators, grave and reverend signiors here on this floor, said, "We are voting for this and against that because we believe it will keep us out of the war." About half the Senators in this Chamber thought when we declared war against Germany, as I gathered it, that it would amount to nothing but sending convoys of battleships with our merchantmen across the seas and occasionally shooting a submarine. I thought and said then that there would be 10,000,000 men in camp before it was ended, and I believe you will see it yet. That is the condition which seemed to me to confront us at that time and it is the condition that is upon us now.

Where are you going to get the other three or five million men? They are excusing and putting seven and a half million men in these deferred classifications of those affected by this bill solely on the ground that they are married. They have six and a half million in deferred classification between 21 and 31 years of age chiefly because they are married.

Now, then, is it possible that the whole burden of the war henceforth is going to devolve on the boys under 21 years old, who have had no opportunity to finish their educations and to get married and establish homes and families? That is the program, as proposed. Where do the next three million come from? You are going to have to go into the deferred classification to get the next three million men or the next four million men, and you ought to do it, in my opinion. If that must be done, then, rather, let us go into the deferred classifications now and only take 500,000 or 600,000 of these boys down to 20 years of age, and leave the other two classes—18 and 19—two years in which to finish their educations; two years in which to develop themselves mentally and physically. Every man here knows that four-fifths of the boys in the United States of 18 years and three-fourths of the boys of 19 years of age are physically and mentally immature.

I shall not take the time to read the statement sent me by William W. Hastings, an authority on growth and development, now brigade physical director, Young Men's Christian Association No. 2, Camp Jackson, Fla., protesting against lowering the draft age as proposed in this bill. He says, however, "It violates the most vital law of conservation of man power. * * * The age of physical maturity in man is a real and vital factor and must be considered. Young men do not fully mature until the average age of 25 years. Men from 25 to 35 years are at their greatest working and fighting capacity physically and in their prime mentally. * * * It is the worst possible human economy to sacrifice boys before maturity. * * * A man of 21 is worth at least 40 per cent more in man power than a boy of 18." After discussing its violation of the educational need, he states, in closing, "The opinion, in brief, is that the drafting of boys 18 to 21 would involve the most vast and senseless waste of the whole war and would advertise to Germany a critical need for men which has no existence in fact."

There was some little camouflage about the proposition of getting these 18 and 19 year old boys in the last call in order that they might finish their education. I asked Gen. March how long, under the present program, it would be before these 18 and 19 and 20 year old boys are called for service. He said, "We expect to use and have every man who is called and qualified under this new draft in France or in camp here between now and the 1st day of next June, and those who go to France must have four to six months' training before they are sent." All 18, 19, and 20 year old boys will be in France by the 1st day of next March, or will be in cantonments and camps here by the 1st day of next June. That is all the leeway that is allowed. That is all the time there will be allowed these young men to finish their education.

In my State recently we have started a go-to-school go-to-college propaganda to encourage the parents to send and the boys to go to school and go to college. That is all right; it is desirable, it is necessary, but if you take all the boys and send them to war no benefit can result from it. It is going to result in my State, largely agricultural, in decreased crop production. There you will find the boys not in college now and not able to go to school on the farms engaged in the production of crops that are as essential to the conduct of the war and maintenance of the Army as soldiers armed with rifles and bayonets.

Those boys are on the farms producing. The farmers are not able to hire men at from five to eight dollars a day, in competition with the shipyards and other Government activities, in order to produce their crops. What will be the result? Less production and boys from 14 to 15 and 16 years of age, who ought to have an opportunity at least to go to school for a time, will be compelled to move up and take the places of those who are 18, 19, and 20 years old, and the latter class and all the others will be deprived of their reasonable opportunity to attend school, to develop their minds and cultivate their brains. I believe that is the condition that will result from this legislation proposed. I do not think it is fair under conditions as they exist.

We need the Army; we need to increase it; we need the man power; but it ought to be made up of men between 21 and 31 years of age; out of the six and a half million men in deferred classifications. Some of it ought to be taken from those between the ages of 31 and 45 years of age, from among the seven and a half to nine million men whom it is expected to excuse. Excuse why? Simply because they are married; not because they have dependents; no. Men of that class who have succeeded, have already builded their homes and fortunes and provided for all dependents; but they are going to be excused because they are married. Men between 21 and 31 are excused because they are not able to take care of their wives and families and go to war, and the others above that age will be excused, although they are able to take care of their families and have no dependents. That is about the way it is going to work out.

I believe that we owe something to the youth of the country. They have volunteered in great numbers—more than a million, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has told you. Then, I do not believe that we ought to take the remainder of the boys and excuse all of these other men and require that hereafter all of the armies shall be composed of boys between 18 and 21 years of age, about two out of every three being taken. That will be the effect of it. I asked Gen. March: "Is it the purpose and will it be necessary for America to send men enough to France to whip Germany?" He said, "That is it, exactly; we must put enough men into France to whip Germany." I asked, "Is it possible that there are expected to be no more new levies by England and by France to recruit their armies except to keep them up to their strength at this time?" He answered, "That is about it. We have got to send enough men to whip the Germans." That is the condition; I say let it be done; but I say let us at least send enough of the men—grown men—within these deferred classifications, who are physically fit, to steady the line when it goes over the top down to death under the charges, as so often it must do. Let us send men from the United States of America, men who have enjoyed the benefits of the civilization of this time; who have had all the blessings and good things of life in this Government of ours; and who have everything to fight for, instead of the boys who have not had their chance.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN rose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I noticed that the Senator from Oregon rose. Does he desire to make any motion?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was simply going to ask for a vote on the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York offers an amendment, which will be read.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, one moment. Do I understand that there are committee amendments pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that there are committee amendments pending.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then I shall not press the consideration of my amendment at this time, but I should like the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert in the bill at the proper place the following words:

That all men rendered available for induction into the military service of the United States through registration or draft heretofore or hereafter made pursuant to any law heretofore or hereafter enacted shall be liable to service in the Army or the Navy or the Marine Corps and shall be distributed to the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps under regulations to be prescribed by the President.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I would suggest to the Senator that the words "or hereafter," before the word "enacted" be eliminated from his amendment. We can not control the action of subsequent Congresses.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will perfect the amendment, if I may, Mr. President, in that regard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has the privilege of making any modification he may desire of his amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I desire to take the time of the Senate for a few moments to make some observations on the amendment which I have offered, although I realize that it can not be brought to a vote at this time.

Senators will understand, having heard the amendment read, that it will operate to bring the Navy and the Marine Corps under the selective-draft system. Senators, of course, remember that in the Marine Corps and the Navy, both in the regular Navy, so called, and in the Naval Reserve, recruiting is done entirely by the volunteer system. That has been the case since our entrance into the war. In fact, the Navy and the Marine Corps have always relied upon the volunteer system to get men for those services. The Committee on Military Affairs listened to the testimony of Admiral Palmer, the chief of the Bureau of Navigation, on this topic; and it is fair to say—and I think I ought to tell Senators—that the admiral, who said that he reflected the official opinion of the Navy Department, did not look with favor upon this suggestion, stating, as I remember, that the Navy was doing very well, was getting the kind of men it wanted, was getting as many as it wanted, and that they would dislike to be disturbed in any respect in their recruiting system or to have any drastic change made. He stated to the committee that between now and January 1, 1920, the Navy and Marine Corps combined—it was a somewhat rough estimate—would need 300,000 men; that they expected to take the men at the rate of 15,000 men a month for the Navy; that the Marine Corps would recruit that organization up to its full authorized strength and would also recruit to meet wastage; and the aggregate would be in the neighborhood of 300,000 men.

As I look over the figures and estimates presented by the Provost Marshal General and contained in the report of the Military Affairs Committee—and the chairman of the committee will correct me if I am wrong—the estimates as to the number of men which will be available for the Army in the event that this bill passes and the age limits are fixed at from 18 to 45, I do not see any allowance made for the 300,000 men who are going to be sent to the Navy by the volunteer system. Am I correct in that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Senators, 300,000 men, while small by comparison with 2,300,000 men that the Army will need, are, nevertheless, a large body of men. They are the equivalent of seven divisions; and, unless I am entirely mistaken, the estimates of the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War, in which they stated that this new draft law will produce 80 divisions in France and 18 divisions at home for the Army, will have to be modified by at least seven divisions if the Navy is to receive the men that it says it will need.

This brings up the entire question as to how the military forces of the United States—and when I use the term "military forces" I include the Navy and the Marine Corps—shall be recruited in such manner as that each branch of the military forces, such as the Army and the Navy and the Marine Corps, shall get the type of men they need in sufficient numbers. As the war proceeds, after the passage of this bill, the Army authorities will be in possession of the entire man power of the United States. Every man between the ages of 18 and 45, if this bill passes, will be registered for the Army and can be held for the Army, and the Navy and the Marine Corps must of necessity come to the Army and ask permission that a certain number of men from time to time be released in order that they may volunteer and enlist in the Navy or the Marine Corps.

The question may seem somewhat academic, but it seems more important to me than merely from the academic side. As the war goes on and more and more men are taken for the Army and the Navy and the Marine Corps, it is almost inevitable that there must come some degree of friction or misunderstanding between the two systems. It is all very well to make estimates at this time and say how many men the Navy will need and how many men the Army will need. The inaccuracy of those estimates is indicated the instant we take up this bill and see that they have completely forgotten the Navy in making the estimates as to the soldiers the Army is going to get. I think it can not be denied that with a selective-draft system working throughout the entire man power of the country, and a volunteer system working at the same time and endeavoring to accomplish the same results, you have an inevitable conflict of principle.

Mr. OVERMAN. Did the admiral say how he expected to get these 300,000 men? Did the Senator ask him the question as to how he expected to get them?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The admiral was asked those questions and so was the Secretary of War when this matter was brought up when he appeared before the committee. The answer was that they had every reason to believe that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy would get along amicably, and that the Navy would get the men it needed; but, nevertheless, the conflict in principle will exist, and, in my judgment, that conflict will tend to increase, for you are trying to conduct two diametrically opposed methods of recruiting the armed forces of the United States at one and the same time.

Now that the Congress, if I judge its temper aright, is about to authorize the President to take over potentially the entire man power of the United States, I think this is the proper and opportune moment to say that all of that man power shall be placed, when necessary, in the different branches of the armed forces through the selective-draft system.

There have been some unfortunate effects already in this situation. When I say that I do not mean for one moment to reflect upon the Navy or the Army or upon the motives of either recruiting service; but it is a fact that in at least two important recruiting areas the lists of men between the draft ages as at present defined and as registered and classified for the Army are made use of by the Navy recruiting officers, who go and persuade those men to get released by their local boards and voluntarily to enlist in the Navy.

To such a degree was that done in the State of New Jersey—and it is entirely human that the Navy recruiting officers should do that—that the quotas from several important districts in that State, upon which the Provost Marshal General and the Army were relying for men at a given date fixed ahead of time, were not there; the Navy had taken them. The same thing occurred in Virginia, if my information is correct, where, very humanly, the Navy recruiting officer secured, so I am informed, the list of all the young men registered under class 1 of the draft and started a recruiting campaign amongst them, appealing to them personally to go into the Navy; and they did so by the hundreds. When the Army came to get its quota from those particular districts, the quota was not there; it had been sadly depleted. It threw out of kilter, as it were, or out of joint, all the calculations of the Army selective-draft system with respect to the numbers of men that they thought they had ready to be called and put into the service.

I contend, Mr. President, that those two things ought not to be permitted to exist side by side. There should not be any distinction between a volunteer and a drafted man in this war. I have no sympathy with suggestions that are occasionally made that it is unwise in its effect upon the morale of military units to mix drafted men and volunteers. I think the impression that has existed in some persons' minds that that was an unwise thing to do and that the volunteer looks down upon the drafted man is utterly wrong. It may be in some isolated cases that for the first two or three days after the two groups of men are joined in one unit that some thoughtless volunteer may sneer a little, but dating from the hour when those two groups of men get tired together, when the sweat stands out on their brows, and they work together for a common country, all thought of difference between them is lost. I know myself of well-known military units now in active service, made up of three-quarters of volunteers and one-quarter of drafted men, and you never hear it mentioned; they are all soldiers of the United States, working together and ready, if need be, to die together.

Mr. President, Congress and the Government have very wisely adopted the policy of the selective draft. I think it should apply to all branches of the military service; and I do not believe that any one branch of the military service should be permitted to go out and recruit men into its ranks without any regard whatsoever to the needs of some other branch or of some industry. That can be done, and is being done to-day. The Navy, of course, is getting a splendid lot of men; no one would for a moment criticize the enlisted personnel of the Navy; but it is true, nevertheless, that in many cases the men who are permitted voluntarily to enlist in the Navy by so doing violate the principle of the selective draft when, as is the case in many instances, they are more needed somewhere else.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will not this result follow if this bill passes, namely, that the Army will secure jurisdiction of all of the men between 18 and 45, and the Navy will not be able to get any men without the consent of the War Department?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I thought I had covered that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not hear the Senator do so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is true that if this bill passes the Navy must come to the Army and ask for men. Of course the Army will give them men; the Commander in Chief, the President of the United States, will see to it that there shall be no injustice; but they will not get them through the selective draft; they will get them by persuading the local boards to release them from the selective draft, and then volunteer, and in many cases the men who will have volunteered in the Navy in that way might be of more service in some other branch or left at home in industry or in agriculture. A good many cases have come to my attention of patriotic young fellows who have enlisted voluntarily in the Navy who might better have stayed at home, and who would have been more valuable at home; but the selective draft system did not operate in the Navy recruiting; there is no check, no control, and no system about it except the will or the desire of the individual.

I am frank to say that the Secretary of the Navy, as Admiral Palmer stated, is opposed to this amendment; but I really would like to hear a genuine argument against the principle of it. Is it not safer and wiser at this time to prepare the way for a recruiting system for all the armed forces of the United States which shall last clear through this war and without any friction whatsoever?

Mr. President, I merely had this to say on the amendment which I have offered. I wish now to make a few observations on the bill itself.

I welcome this bill; I am exceedingly glad that the Committee on Military Affairs has reported it, and I sincerely hope that it will pass at the earliest possible moment. I am glad that it is here, and I urge its passage at the earliest possible moment, because to my mind it is the final act—if any act of a legislative body may be considered final—of America going into this war with all her might. I could wish, sir, that it had been done before, but I make no complaint at this time of that. I am glad that it is apparently going to be done.

As I have viewed the situation for several months—and I have made some of my views known upon the floor of the Senate upon prior occasions—an act of this sort has been inevitable ever since Russia collapsed. The withdrawal of her mighty army from the war has changed the entire picture, has upset the balance completely, and put the Teutonic powers in a position where their man power in the war zone exceeded the man power of the allies. When Russia collapsed and created that situation it was then and there inevitable, and has been every week that has passed since then, that America would have to come to legislation such as is now proposed to make up for that loss in man power.

It is a grim business, Mr. President. There are phases of the situation that are not pleasant to discuss; there will be incidents by the thousand that will occur all over this country as the result of the passage of this bill which will be very difficult and very painful. I well understand, I think, the feeling of a great many people about lowering the draft age. I do not deride that feeling for a moment; I respect it; and were we not confronted with the situation which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has so eloquently described, the biggest fight that this country ever engaged in, and the end not yet in sight, I would not urge that boys of 20, 19, and 18 be taken into the Army under the draft law.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I heard a great speech delivered a few days ago by a member of the French mission, who stated that the minimum age limit of the French Army was 19. Has the Senator any information as to that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My information is not so reliable that I would ask the Senator to take it without hesitation. My understanding, however, is that that figure is the peace-time age for the French soldier to start upon his compulsory military training; but I am quite certain that during this war the French Government has called to the colors for training purposes men considerably below the minimum age fixed in the statute and in that way has anticipated their reaching that age and becoming active soldiers; in fact, I think that 17-year-old boys have been put in training in France, so that they might fight when they were 18. I am not certain as to that, however, and I do not ask the Senator to take my word for it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I think it is true that what they call the class of 1919 have already been called to the colors, which would embrace men under the age of 19, if that is the regulation age.

Mr. OVERMAN. I asked the gentleman to whom I have referred at what age men were called to the colors, and he said not lower than 19. I asked an officer of the War Department if he had any information, and he said he thought in Italy it was 19 and in England it was 19. So I thought, perhaps, the Senator had investigated it and had information probably different from that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President, I have not.

I was saying, sir, that, were it not for the situation that confronts us, I would not urge that a law of this kind be passed imposing military service upon men below the age of 21. I am so convinced that the crisis confronting us is so grave and that every other alternative would be so dangerous that I support this bill with every atom of earnestness that I can command.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think, if the draft law should be so amended as to permit young men 18 years of age to volunteer without their parents' consent, that an ample Army could be raised for the purposes of meeting the conditions that confront us as they have been described by the Senator from New York?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not think that that would meet the situation, Mr. President.

Mr. VARDAMAN. My idea is that there are some young men who at 18 are as mature as others at 21; there are boys of 15 who might desire to go to war, and who would really make more efficient soldiers than others at 19. If we make a universal rule to take boys of the tender age of 18 and compel them to enter the service, I am afraid that it will not work as the Senator, I am sure, hopes for. That is the only thing that disturbs me about the matter. It is a pretty tender age at which to make the rule universal and compel service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think we ought to remember that the rule is not universal. The rule imposing the duty of registering is universal. Then, of course, we must trust in the judgment of the local boards and the examining physicians to refrain from taking into the service any man, be he 18 or 28, who is not physically fit to go; and if a boy of 18 be so evidently immature and so evidently undeveloped as to make it reasonably certain that he would not be a good soldier, then, of course, he must be left at home. I merely make this observation because the Senator from Mississippi used the expression "universal rule," whereas it is not a universal rule that they must all serve.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The rule is universal with reference to taking the men into the service at that age. There is more in the spirit of a boy at the age of 18 than there is in physical development. I think the Senator will recognize that fact. There is more in the spirit of a boy fitting him for military service than in physical development at that tender age.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not sure that I understand the observation of the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I will make myself understood. I say there is more in the spirit of the boy of 18; there is a disposition to fight, although an older boy may be physically better developed than the little fellow who wants to go. That is the point. It is the boy with the spirit, with the fervor, with the desire to enter the conflict, whom I would be perfectly willing to permit to volunteer, even against the wishes of his parents.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand the Senator now.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator in his statement said that he was in favor of the bill as it is. I want to ask him a question with relation to the ages between 40 and 45.

I notice from the report that between the ages of 40 and 45 it is estimated that 153,150 soldiers will be secured. Does the Senator really believe that in order to secure that small number it is worth while to register all of the men of this country between the ages of 40 and 45?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps I can answer the Senator's question by approaching it from a different angle. I really have no data upon which to base the statement which I am going to make—none whatever—but I am nevertheless pretty thoroughly convinced that the ages from 40 to 45 will produce a great many more than 153,000 men.

Mr. SMOOT. I take the number from the report of the committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I know it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the number that the report shows. Taking into consideration the fact that it will take fathers, and perhaps fathers who have one or two or perhaps three sons in the Army, and that if this estimate is correct we could only secure that small number of soldiers, it does seem to me that it would be unwise to upset the man power of the country between the ages of 40 and 45 and take a class of men upon whom great responsibilities are resting, not only as the fathers of families but as the heads of business concerns of this country as well. The result, if this report is accurate, is so small that it has occurred to me that perhaps it would be better to stop at 40 years than to go to 45; and I wanted to know if the Senator had really made a study of that question. If so, I should like to have him tell us the result of it, because I have great confidence in the Senator's judgment when it comes to a question of military affairs.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I must confess that I have not made a study, as the Senator says, of that particular part of this problem. I think the Senator will find that when men between 40 and 45 are registered and made subject to draft there will be very few cases of the kind he describes—of men being placed in class 1 who are the fathers, we will say, of men already in the Army.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know why they should not be.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very, very few cases. Most of the men of that age, of course, will be placed in deferred classifications.

Mr. SMOOT. Why should they be?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Because they have dependent families.

Mr. SMOOT. There are many, many cases where they are not dependent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In that case they would not be placed in deferred classifications, although married. I can not agree with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], who said that every married man is exempt. That is not accurate.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not so understand it myself, and that is the reason why I referred to married men. Now, I do not believe that is necessary, nor is the crisis so great at this time, nor do I believe that it will come, when we will be compelled to draft a man of 44 years, say, with two sons serving in the Army. I hardly think that time will ever arrive; and I do know this: You take the western country. Marriages there are earlier than they are in the East. Forty-five is the age when a man's family requires the most patient attention, and I know that many men of that age have sons now in the Army, and not a few, but thousands of them; and therefore I have doubted the wisdom of making this draft apply above 40 years.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It may seem to the Senator from Utah and to other Senators that the number of one hundred and fifty thousand odd is a small number to be obtained from the registering of men between 40 and 45 years of age; but 150,000 soldiers are, after all, a pretty important body of men, and if you do not get them between the ages of 40 and 45 you must get them somewhere else; and if these estimates can be relied upon at all, that extra 153,000 taken from younger men might well result in invading the deferred classifications of younger men.

I can not quite agree with the Senator from Utah about the crisis not being grave enough to warrant it. I will say very frankly that if I had my way I would put the maximum age limit at 55; and I would authorize the President, as he is authorized in this bill, to call the men by classes, according to their ages, as he sees fit. But the time may very well come when we shall need every man of 45, 46, and 47 years of age who is militarily fit to go into the Army.

The Senator may say that it is a most unusual thing for a father and son to be sent into the Army at the same time. It has already occurred among my relatives, and the son has been killed. It has occurred by the thousands in England and in France. It depends upon what you have to meet, Mr. President. If the fight gets desperate enough and goes on long enough to demand it, we shall have to do those things; and I should like to see all of the men registered to-day, rather than at some future time Congress be again asked, in a somewhat hesitant voice, to alter the age limits. I think it is wise, Mr. President, to register all the men up to 45, and I think it would be wiser to make it 55—not necessarily to take them all up to 55 at once, but to make it possible to take them later on if the necessity should arise; and that 153,000 men to whom the Senator refers might become a most important 153,000 men at a certain crisis in this war. No one can tell. It may not seem worth while to do it now, but it may turn out to have been infinitely worth while six months from now, or two years from now. So I do not regret the elaborate machinery and the expense involved in registering that small number of men between 40 and 45.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator has answered the question very frankly; and not only is it his judgment that 45-year-old men should be registered, but men up to 55 years should be. That may be so, Mr. President. I have not fully made up my mind yet as to where the limit should be; but it does seem to me that instead of taking the 150,000 men above 40 years of age there are three or four million men at present in the deferred classes that should be drafted into the Army before the fathers of 40 and 45 years are drafted into the Army for military service. That is the way it looks to me. I know of men who are in deferred classes that there could be no good reason assigned why they should not serve their country in the Army under any great stress, or under the conditions as they exist to-day. I do not belittle the crisis that we are in; and, indeed, if I had had my way the Army would have been increased months and months ago, and the fight would have been made as energetically and as persistently as it was possible to make it, because I realize that that is the way to win this war. The only thing I had in mind was, would it not be better to take from the deferred classes men we know are fit for service, and get not only 150,000 but 1,500,000 if we wanted them, rather than invade the man power between 41 and 45 years of age?

I hope the Senator from New York did not draw the conclusion from what I said that I was seriously opposed to the age limit reaching 45; but I believe that this question ought to be discussed, and we ought to arrive at what is the best for the country. If it was necessary to take men of 75 to win the war, nobody would object. At least, I can say that I would not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am very glad the Senator has brought up the question. It is a very interesting phase of this subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Personally, I believe that we shall be required to raise just as large an army as this country can maintain in order to accomplish the end we have in view, and I think we ought to do it just as speedily as we can. My question relates to a little discouragement I felt upon the examination of Gen. Crowder's report. He reports that between the ages of 31 and 45, inclusive, we may expect but 600,000 men. I know that he has been perfectly sincere in reaching that conclusion, and I assume that he has reached it by applying his experience in the execution of the draft law with the men between 21 and 30; but I should like to know if the Senator from New York is satisfied with that conclusion? Does his own reasoning verify it?

I believe that a great many more than 600,000 men will be found ready to enter the military service. I have given some study to it, but the Senator from New York knows much more about it than I possibly can; and I should like to hear somebody connected with the Military Affairs Committee discuss that phase of the matter. I think there are more than 600,000 men between 31 and 45 who would not claim exemption or claim a deferred classification at all; and I can not conceive a situation in which a great many married men will not be found between those ages who have accumulated enough so that it can not be said in any proper sense that their families are dependent upon their personal efforts for support.

I want somebody to encourage the country in the belief that we will find more effectives than 600,000 between the ages of 31 and 45. I confess that I do not like to see so great a part of the burden cast upon the boys under 21, although I am entirely in favor of the registration of the young men from 18 to 21; but I think it would be a little disappointing to the country if, in desiring 2,300,000 men, we should find it necessary to take 1,700,000 of them from those under 21 and only 600,000 of them from the men above 30.

Mr. CUMMINS. Above 30, because the age of 31 itself is included in this draft, although the Senator from Indiana is quite right in saying that the present draft brings within it all men up to the time they arrive at the age of 31. If the Senator from New York can give us any light upon that subject, which seems to me to be a very important one, I should be delighted to have him do so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, of course, the subject is most important, but I fear I can not rise to the occasion. I have no figures, and I do not know where any can be obtained, that would contradict the estimate of the Provost Marshal General, and yet I am of the same opinion as the Senator from Iowa. I think it will turn out to be a fact that a great many more than 600,000 men will be available for the Army between the ages of 31 and 45. I think the Senator from Iowa is correct in the statement that thousands and thousands of married men whose business has been pretty thoroughly established, while their families are in a sense dependent on them and their efforts, nevertheless will be able to leave and go into the Army and their business be managed in some such way as to get along during the war. I think it will turn out that there will be thousands of these, and it is possible that the Provost Marshal General, in making his estimates, does not include any such men as potential soldiers.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want to be understood as even challenging the report of the Provost Marshal General, because he is a very learned man and a very skillful man in this respect; but I know—and he discloses it in his report—that he has applied his experience under the former draft law in reaching these results, and I believe that there are very many respects in which the former experience will not be found an accurate guide.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I agree with the Senator. I think the situation is very apt to show a decided change when the registration and classification of men over 40, we will say, has been completed. I think it will show that a great many business men have reached that stage in the development of their business where it is called a success, an established business, and they are therefore able to go into the Army, whereas the same man at 32 or 35, engaged in the same business, nevertheless has not reached that stage in the development of his business where he can drop it. I think that will turn out to be the fact in thousands of cases.

Mr. OVERMAN and Mr. KELLOGG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield; and if so, to whom?

Mrs. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it not a fact also that the sentiment of the country has changed, and that there are more men to-day who will not claim exemption under the law than there were when the war first started and the draft was made?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is not the slightest question of that.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it not a fact that the Provost Marshal General bases his figures as to the number of men he will receive between the ages of 32 and 45, inclusive, on the percentage of married men excused between 21 and 31, and that while one man's opinion, perhaps, is as good as another's, that is very unreliable at this stage of the war? I know of a great many men who would not have hesitated to claim exemption because they had dependent families who will never claim it now, and who are going to take the first opportunity to go.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, of course the object of this bill is obvious. It is to furnish America the weapon with which she will help win the war in the shortest possible time. Of course it is entirely possible for us to get the needed men. The question is, Where shall we get them, and what kind of men shall we get for the Army? It may seem extreme, as some Senators believe and a great many people believe, to take men below 21 years of age; but the element in this situation that I think should compel us to support this bill is just this: When you take men below 21 years of age, down to and including the age of 18, and within reasonable limits thereby keep your fighting forces as young as possible, and disturb industry as little as possible, you will in the long run save lives and win the war quicker, for it can not be denied—all history shows it—that it is youth that survives in war and wins at the end. It has been shown over and over and over again. It has been quoted here upon the floor of the Senate in connection with the Civil War. It is being shown on the battle fields of France to-day.

Youth can fight or dig all day and lie down and, with a two-hour nap, jump up refreshed and renew its work. Middle age can not do that for any length of time. If America wants the very best and most effective weapon to win this war, she must put into the field her ablest men for fighting purposes. The ablest men are the men under 30; and as soldiers, generally speaking, they are at their prime at 19 and 20. There are exceptions, of course; but, generally speaking, a younger army will whip an older army in any long war, other things being equal.

So, Mr. President, in my judgment there is good ground, there is sound reason and logic, in this proposal—so sound and so logical that it can be presented to the American people frankly and fully and their support and approval of it urged on the ground that it is a life-saver, that it is a war winner; and the quicker we can win the war and the fewer lives we expend in doing it the better the people of the United States will be pleased. That is what they want, and that is what we want. The ages 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22 are the ages that will win this war. That is the justification for this bill, and a complete justification for it, and people will soon understand it. I believe that thousands and thousands of them already understand it, and are ready—yes, willing, even anxious—to accept it and go to work.

Senators, Russia collapsed last Christmas, and 6,000,000 men were taken from the allied armies by that collapse; and it is not until August, 1918, that America makes up her mind, through the action of her Government and her Congress, to make good that loss. But we have made up our minds now, I believe, and we are serving notice upon Germany and our allies that we are in this thing to the bitter end, with all our force, all our resources, and that never again are we going to be overtaken by an emergency. We are going to move ahead of any possible emergencies.

I am glad the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] discussed Russia here this afternoon. We have just decided to act about Russia—just commenced to do something about it.

It is high time, Senators. The Czecho-Slovaks have been begging us for four months to come to their assistance. I believe that when this war is over and history is written their achievement will be put down as one of the most remarkable and romantic in all history; and I will confess that my heart has been going out to those people, away off there in Siberia, fighting their battle all alone in a foreign, strange country, half armed, half clothed, doomed to destruction unless they are helped, and winter coming on in six weeks. They can not go back to Austria. They are nearly all of them deserters from the Austrian Army. They held together when Russia collapsed and maintained a degree of discipline. They had their regiments, brigades, and divisions in the Russian troops. They held together. They resisted Bolshevik influence. They were a rather uncomfortable element for the Bolsheviki and the Germans. They refused to disperse. They could not go back to Austria; and finally, according to my information, they made an agreement with the Bolshevik Government at Moscow that they would be permitted by the Bolshevik Government to travel eastward over the railways of Russia and over the Siberian Railroad and eventually reach Vladivostok, and then they hoped to reach the United States, and, reaching here, go on to France and fight. When they had started on that great migration across that enormous expanse of country the Bolshevik Government, no doubt inspired by its German masters, made up its mind that it was an unwise thing to contribute or permit the contribution of 100,000 soldiers to the forces of the allies in the shape of these Bohemians and Slovaks. They tried to stop them, and when they tried to stop them those people got out of their trains and seized the railroads and to-day possess nearly all of them from the Volga in European Russia to Vladivostok, with three or four comparatively minor exceptions, fighting with their backs to the wall and calling for us, for Japan, for Great Britain, for France to come and help them.

There they are to-day with almost the entire transportation system of Asiatic Russia in their possession. Thank heaven we have started at last, and I hope we will go the limit in helping them. They are our friends, that little 100,000, scattered along that 5,000 miles of railroad, most of them without shoes, all of them without overcoats, a third of them without rifles, but still holding their own. That little 100,000 men have performed a greater military service than any 300,000 men in this war.

Mr. President, I hope we will go to their assistance properly and promptly with men, with guns, with ammunition, with clothing and supplies. To us and our allies a golden opportunity has been presented by this heroic group. As the Senator from Missouri says, they have given us the opportunity once more to commence battering at the back door of Germany, once more to make this a world war against the Teutonic empires.

We need men, Senators. We may need more men than are contemplated under this act, but it is imperative that we pass this act at the earliest possible moment that men shall become available to be put into the camps and trained and sent wherever they are needed to fight the Germans.

Mr. KIRBY. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] asked the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] to submit an amendment for him. The Senator from Wyoming has been unexpectedly called from the Chamber, and I offer it in his behalf.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if it is his intention to ask for a vote on any amendment to-night?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No. I understand the Senator wishes to make some observations.

Mr. CURTIS. I have a resolution here from the Kansas Farm Mortgage Bankers' Association which I desire to present, and I should like to submit a few remarks. It will probably take me three or four minutes, but I do not care to have it come in the proceedings on the pending bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There was a very earnest request for an executive session, and unless there is some objection I will ask that the bill be laid aside until to-morrow morning, and in the executive session I shall ask for a recess until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the pending bill will be laid aside until to-morrow.

FARM-LOAN BONDS.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the New York Times, in its financial columns of June 2, said:

> There is a suspicion in some quarters that the selling of liberty bonds has been induced by the opportunity to reinvest funds in farm-loan issues, which not only pay a higher return but carry the tax-exemption privilege. Liquidation yesterday brought about new low points. The second 4's moved back to 93.52 and the 4½'s to 96.36. The movement is of no significance as reflecting any change in bankers' estimates of the new war situation, but it is interesting for its probable bearing on the fixing of the rate which will have to be carried by the fall Government offerings.

The 4½ per cent Federal farm-loan bonds were sold to yield the investor only 4¼. They are practically all bought up, with no more to be had. The 5 per cent Federal farm-loan bonds, to which the Times refers, have now gone to 103¾, judged by the asking price of last Saturday, August 17. This premium, which has given these bonds preference in the market to liberty bonds, is not due to any superiority in the underlying security but is due to the total tax exemption and higher interest.

I wish to insert in the RECORD the following circular published by the Kansas Farm Mortgage Bankers' Association about this matter. I will ask to have it printed without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The circular referred to is as follows:

In the United States are 10 persons each with an annual income of $5,000,000 or more, 9 with an income within that figure and $4,000,000 each, 14 with an income within that figure and $3,000,000 each, 34 with an income within this figure and $2,000,000 each, and 3,733 with an income of at least $150,000 each. Including all with an income of $30,000 and over each, there are 22,696 millionaires. It is among these, particularly the multimillionaires, that the syndicate hired by the Federal Farm Loan Board is finding customers for tax-exempted bonds. The combined income of the 67 persons of the first four classes alone far exceeds $196,000,000 and is sufficient to absorb present issues, while the rest of the boasted billion of bonds can easily be sold among the other classes and owners of new fortunes being made out of the war.

The security of Federal farm loan bonds is not certain and specific, since it may be withdrawn for substitution by the borrowers and even changed in kind or quality through subsequent legislation. Congress may possibly add encumbrances on real estate desired by union labor, and then perhaps paper involving the risk of any other socialistic project that investors will take. The mortgages now comprising the security were selected by officials appointed without regard to civil-service rules, of whom all might not have been as careful as private lenders, and some might hereafter be too lenient with the borrowers because of the formidable political power of their increasing numbers. The payments on the mortgages running for 36 years will not suffice to meet all the bonds at maturity only 20 years away, and so their redemption rests on whether they can be refunded, while their principal and interest may be paid in paper money should any get in circulation, and not in gold.

But the bondholders have no rights enforceable in court should the board wish to take charge of the land banks itself for defaults. Moreover, the board, although the sole supervisor, is also general manager of the system, leaving it without any disinterested authority to inspect and examine its affairs. Finally, the bonds are not guaranteed by the Government, while their tax exemption can be revoked and will soon, with other vital features of the act, be tested for constitutionality. So the small investor sticks to liberty bonds and war-savings stamps, from which he gets a fair return without paying premiums for speculative values, and lets the millionaire have farm-loan bonds. Proof as to which is the purchaser is that liberty bonds can be bought to yield 4.75, as against the only 4.35 per cent of farm-loan bonds. The tax rate on incomes over $1,500,000 is 62 per cent. Interest on the bonds is 5 per cent. The Federal and joint stock land banks can doubtless sell more than $200,000,000 a year.

On that amount the Government would lose $6,200,000 of taxes annually. The large investors are not concerned about the constitutional questions, because when once they have a receipt in full from the revenue collector they are safe, even though the Supreme Court nullify the act. According to E. D. Chassell, the $31 tax exemption on every $1,000 bond bought by the big tax dodger means only $5 saved by the farmer who gave the mortgage. That is, the borrower gets but $1 to every $6.20 of benefit got by the rich bondholder. So there is a reverse side to the advertisement that it is a patriotic duty to buy the bonds. Indeed, more patriotism would be displayed by buying ordinary mortgages that do not affect the Government's credit. Congress ought now to let the land banks stand on their own bottom without any further subsidies or even tax exemptions, because the stupendous war debt needs the Nation's undivided resources.

Since the capital stock of the Federal land banks is impaired and their financial standing not the best, the premiums and ready sale of the bonds are due, of course, to the total tax exemptions, the high yield resulting from the borrower's increased interest and to numerous millionaire buyers seeking to escape taxation. The farmers are beginning to realize this, and that they are billed in consequence to pay more county, State, and national taxes in other directions. Had the board allowed the Federal land banks to have their own selling agency the premiums would have accrued to the system and helped to meet expenses. But the board instead hired a Wall Street syndicate and also had the act so amended as to take the management of the system away from the farmers and prevent them from distributing its benefits in accord with their own ideas of proper methods, justice, and patriotism.

The board's reason for thus abolishing the cooperative features of the system is: "It is doubtful whether the management and control of any bank can be safely delegated to the borrowers." Such a statement, when in this country there are 7,269 building and loan associations, with 3,858,612 members and $1,769,142,175 assets, and in this and other countries 65,000 more credit societies with 15,000,000 members and $7,000,000,000 of annual business besides 23 landschafts with perhaps $1,000,000,000 of bonds, all managed by members or borrowers, caused great offense that lost the board the confidence of organized farmers and true cooperatives. The farmers could not possibly have managed the system worse than the board, either in respect to efficiency, safety, or patriotism.

Costs have eaten into assets just as in similar systems that failed to make good in Canada, Russia, France, Italy, Hungary, and the Balkan States. Loans have been made in regions avoided by private lenders and, contrary to the understood rule, are not being made only on land personally cultivated by the borrower. Some were made in large amounts to persons not strictly farmers, evidently with the hope of increasing more profitable business to the detriment of small cultivators. The easy money might help speculators tempt those who think they are farmers to have a tryout, and also enable real farmers discontented with their occupation or farms to cash in at the Government's risk and expense, unless the board assumes less of a defensive and more of a supervisory attitude toward the land banks.

As a war measure the Federal farm-loan act is a failure, for which purpose, fortunately, it was not passed. Subsequent congressional and Executive action proves this. A House committee is considering a bill to provide farmers with short-term credit on security other than real estate, so as to give lacking aid to tenants, renters, and the quick production of crops. Congress authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to buy $200,000,000 of Federal farm-loan bonds. The trustees have legalized such bonds as collateral for postal savings. In the Federal reserve a fund is being raised among commercial banks to carry warehoused cotton for southern planters. Besides $4,250,000 of public funds deposited with the Federal land banks and the many millions of dollars directly advanced by the Government for seed and fertilizer on the 29th of July $5,000,000 more was taken out of the United States Treasury to lend through the Agricultural Department to farmers reduced to poverty by bad crops. Much money has also been appropriated by the States for such purposes and for tractors.

All this became necessary owing to defects in the Federal Farm Loan System and because most of its money was used to buy up existing mortgages—a very unpatriotic thing to do, since it added little to the so much needed increase of agricultural production and actually diverted money from agriculture already in it. In this refunding campaign no friendliness was shown mortgage men. Differently from all other Government bureaus which gathered eminent men around them, the board prefers to go it alone, with many of its assistants without experience in farm finance.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, under the syndicate arrangement adopted for selling farm-loan bonds it looks as if brokers get the premiums and that the land banks are getting no particular advantage from the tax exemptions of their securities. Would it not therefore be better to let the farmers themselves manage these banks exactly as the law intends? The only change necessary for this would be to give the farmers the entire responsibility for the system and oblige them to operate on their own unquestionably good credit.

This is the secret of the soundness and success of innumerable borrowers' banks of various kinds, among which failures are rarer than among ordinary banks. The 65,000 cooperative credit societies, with 15,000,000 members and $7,000,000,000 of annual business in the world, are based on this idea of using their own credit and of imposing upon members a liability that is either unlimited or else severe enough to be felt. The cooperative bank with unlimited or limited liability has proved its worth wherever tried, in country, town, or city, for encouraging thrift and extending credit in large or small amounts.

The same idea prevails in all true building and loan associations among the 7,269 with 3,858,612 members and $1,769,142,175 assets in the United States. Any member getting a loan must subscribe for shares up to its full amount. His payments are made not on the mortgage but on the shares. When the shares mature he may turn them in and have his debt canceled. The maturing of the shares depends upon his payments and also upon the association's profit and loss. All his credits could be wiped out by a loss, consequently he is liable to the full amount of his mortgage. Profits would hasten the extinction of his debt; and so he is as deeply interested as are nonborrowing members. As a result these associations can operate even on savings with safety, although the borrowers participate in the management.

The landschafts, started 150 years ago, are composed entirely of borrowers. They now number 23 with about $1,000,000,000 of bonds, and none of them ever defaulted an obligation. The borrowers elect all the officers and appraisers, every one of whom must also be a borrower. The borrowers' payments go into a sinking fund, in which the cash on hand, together with the unpaid principal of the loans, must equal outstanding bonds. If this fund becomes impaired in the old landschafts, any member may be assessed without limit for the deficiency. In some of the newer landschafts the liability is limited to the mortgage or some portion of it. But the basic idea in all is that the borrowers have the direct management, use their own credit, and assume liability large enough to be felt.

Nearly all American districts established under State laws for sanitary, mining, or agricultural drainage embody landschaft features. Their bonded indebtedness amounts to millions of dollars. The bonds are not instruments of the State or Federal Government. They are obligations only of the districts. But through the district's right to levy assessments they are secured by the collective ability of the owners of the benefited property and so are easily marketed at reasonable interest rates, although these beneficiaries of the issue also elect the managers.

With these successful instances of borrowers' banks here and in foreign countries, Congress should not hesitate or delay in placing the Federal land banks under the management and responsibility of the farmers. By so doing the farmers, and not rich investors, would get the advantage of all premiums on the bonds.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 22, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God our Savior, let Thy blessing descend upon us to fructify our minds, cleanse our hearts, and make straight our paths in all worthy undertakings, and thus prove ourselves sons of the living God.

Make us valiant in fight, gallant in a victory for democracy, that Prussianism, militarism, and autocracy may be swept from the face of the earth; that the sun may shine for all and the earth yield abundantly to the labors of freemen.

To this end strengthen our arms and those of our allies, that the day of rejoicing may come speedily. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RATIFICATION OF THE PROHIBITION AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received a communication from the governor of the State of Louisiana, countersigned by the secretary of state, announcing the ratification of the prohibition amendment, which the Clerk will file among the archives of the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SUMNERS, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for 10 days, on account of illness.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Judge WATKINS, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

TEMPORARY INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, under the special order, I call up the bill (H. R. 12731) amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917. And I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. GILLETT. I think we ought to have it considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12731, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be concluded in two hours, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12731, and, pending that, he asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from California, Mr. KAHN. Is there objection?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama whether he contemplates a liberal debate under the five-minute rule?

Mr. DENT. I certainly do. That matter, as the gentleman from California knows, was discussed in committee yesterday immediately after the bill was reported, and we all agreed that that should be the course pursued.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question. Of course, this is a very important measure. It is one that, at least in respect to a certain item, there will certainly be a division of opinion among the Members of the House. No matter on which side Members may vote, they desire to express their views. Two hours is a ridiculously short time for the discussion of this important measure. If the members of the committee do their duty by the House, they will take all of that time and more themselves. In addition to that, there are some gentlemen of the House, I am sure, who have views and would like, briefly, to present them. It may be that 5 or 10 minutes each is all that they would like, but they would like that very much. I can see no difference whatever in having the 5 or 10 minutes of general debate where they belong—and I am speaking as far as the economy of time is concerned—and having them bunched under the five-minute rule, where they do not belong, and all subject to a point of order, where some man who may be a little obstreperous and not like the way things are going can stop the proceedings in a minute. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that he lengthen the time for general debate. I am willing, for one, and others share the same view, to stay here until 10 o'clock or midnight if gentlemen desire to pass the bill to-day. But let us give this vital and important matter to the homes and the welfare of the Nation a fair and decent consideration in the House, and let us not make the House purely a rubber stamp for another body.

Mr. DENT. Let me say to the gentleman from Minnesota that when the $12,000,000,000 Army appropriation bill was before the House, in the first part of June, carrying a great many very important legislative features, the House dispensed with general debate, and the entire matter was discussed under the five-minute rule. I never have heard a single word of complaint from any Member of the House on either side that he was not given full and fair opportunity to present his views.

Mr. MONDELL. But that bill appropriated the money of the country, and this applies to the citizenship.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to say that in my judgment the action we took in respect to the $12,000,000,000 bill was radically and fundamentally wrong. We were induced to do it under a misapprehension. That bill was adequately and fully considered in another branch of this body without being hurried, and we could have spent two or three days' time on the bill with a good deal of propriety.

Mr. DENT. How much time does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It seems to me that if we had three hours, an hour and a half on a side, it would be sufficient. I want to hear what the members of the committee have to say upon the various features of the bill.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to amend the request, although I have had practically no requests for time on this side of the House. I ask that the time be fixed at three hours, one half of it to be controlled by the gentleman from California and the other half by myself.

Mr. KAHN. And that all debate be confined to the bill.

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman allow me 15 minutes of that time?

Mr. DENT. Yes; I shall yield the gentleman 15 minutes of that time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. There are a number of pages employed here by the House who are about 18 years old, and I would like to have sufficient time to bring them down on the floor, and test them out to see whether they can carry a hundred or more pounds on their backs, whether they are mature, whether they are likely soldiers. So I would like to have a few minutes' times in the debate.

Mr. DENT. I can assure the gentleman that he will have at least 10 minutes at some time during the debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and pending that he asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to not exceeding three hours, one-half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and one-half by himself, debate to be confined to the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when we took up the revenue bill the people of the country insisted that we take weeks and months discussing the bill. This bill as presented to the House will take the 18, the 19, and the 20-year-old boys from their homes throughout the country, and it does seem to me that three hours is too short a time for this House to debate a question of that kind, and I therefore object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida objects. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12731.

The question was taken.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division in order to see whether there is a quorum present.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 168, noes 0.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12731, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think the bill should be read for the information of the House and country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12731) amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

Be it enacted, etc., That the second sentence of section 2 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens and male persons residing in the United States, not alien enemies, who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 18 and 45, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act: Provided, That the President may draft such persons liable to military service in such sequence of ages and at such time or times as he may prescribe: And provided further, That a citizen or subject of a country neutral in the present war who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States shall be relieved from liability to military service upon his making a declaration, in accordance with such regulations as the President may prescribe, withdrawing his intention to become a citizen of the United States, which shall operate and be held to cancel his declaration of intention to become an American citizen, and he shall forever be debarred from becoming a citizen of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the provision of section 4 of said act, "persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency," be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"Persons engaged in occupations or employments found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency."

SEC. 3. That section 4 of said act be amended by adding at the end thereof the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this section contained shall prevent the President, if he deems it advisable, from appointing as a member of a local board any person residing outside the subdivision or area in which such local board has jurisdiction, or from transferring a member of one local board to another local board outside the subdivision or area in which such person resides.

SEC. 4. That section 5 of said act be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"That all male persons between the ages of 18 and 45, both inclusive, shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President, and upon proclamation by the President or other public notice given by him, or by his direction, stating the time or times and place or places of any such registration, it shall be the duty of all persons of the designated ages, except officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, the Navy, and the National Guard and Naval Militia while in the service of the United States, to present themselves for and submit to registration under the provisions of this act; and every such person shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of this act upon the publication of any such proclamation or any such other public notice as aforesaid given by his direction; and any person who shall willfully fail or refuse to present himself for registration or to submit thereto as herein provided shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction in a district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, and shall thereupon be duly registered: Provided, That in the call of the docket precedence shall be given in courts trying the same to the trial of criminal proceedings under this act: Provided further, That persons shall be subject to registration as herein provided who shall have attained their eighteenth birthday and who shall not have attained their forty-sixth birthday on or before the day set for the registration in any such proclamation by the President or any such other public notice given by him or by his direction; and all persons so registered shall be and remain subject to draft into the forces hereby authorized unless exempted or excused therefrom as in this act provided: Provided further, That the President may at such intervals as he may desire from time to time require all male persons who have attained the age of 18 years since the last preceding date of registration and on or before the next date set for registration by proclamation by the President, except such persons as are exempt from registration hereunder, to register in the same manner and subject to the same requirements and liabilities as those previously registered under the terms hereof: And provided further, That in the case of temporary absence from actual place of legal residence of any person liable to registration as provided herein, such registration may be made by mail under regulations to be prescribed by the President."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 7, strike out "precribe" and insert the word "prescribe," and strike out the remainder of line 7 and all of lines 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16, and the word "States," on line 17, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, however, That registrants who on the date fixed by the President for registration are of the age of 19 years and not over 20 years shall be designated as the 19 class and shall be drafted subsequent to registrants in class 1 of the age of 20 years and over the age of 20 years; and registrants of the age of 18 years and not over 19 years shall be designated the 18 class and shall be last called for service. All registrants of the age of 20 years and above on the day fixed by the President for registration shall be called prior to those in the classes hereby created."

"SEC. 4. That during the present emergency the minimum age limit of officers of the Army of the United States, not above the rank of captain, shall be 18 years.

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War is authorized to assign to educational institutions, for special and technical training, soldiers who enter the military service under the provisions of this act in such numbers and under such regulations as he may prescribe; and is authorized to contract with such educational institutions for the subsistence, quarters, and military and academic instruction of such soldiers.

"Funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated for quarters and subsistence of the Army shall be available for payments to educational institutions under the contracts above authorized, including the cost of military and academic instruction."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, in order that the membership of the House may understand the program that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and myself have agreed upon, so that they may govern themselves accordingly, after a few moments of discussion I shall move that the Committee rise and report the bill back to the House, and when we return to the House I shall ask that general debate continue during the day up until 5 o'clock, with the understanding that we take up the bill for consideration to-morrow under the five-minute rule, and that we sit to-morrow until the bill is finally passed. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DENT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12731, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12731. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate run during the entire day, to be concluded at 5 o'clock, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from California and the other half by myself, with the understanding that at that time the committee shall rise, and I give notice that to-morrow it is our intention that the House shall stay in session until the bill is finally acted upon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12731, and pending that asks unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill be continued until 5 o'clock this afternoon when the Committee shall rise, one half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from California, debate to be confined to the bill itself, and he gives notice that to-morrow he is going to ask the House to stay in session until the bill is finally acted upon. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman a question, or ask for information as to another matter. Now, this is a very important bill, and I do not like to object to the request which the chairman of the committee makes, but I am interested very much in what we will do to-morrow. I understand that the revenue bill is to come in on Monday next, and if that is true, I realize it is of too great importance to be delayed, as I do with this bill; but I do want to state to the Members of the House frankly, as far as I am concerned, as chairman of the Committee on Water Power, that I am not going to agree to the water-power bill being considered by way of temporary installments, especially since it has reached the amendment stage, and if this bill takes up all of to-morrow and if the revenue bill comes in Monday, I am not going to ask that the water-power bill be considered until after the revenue bill is disposed of. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means here, but I do not think, as a member of the committee, there is any chance whatever of the bill being reported on Monday.

Mr. SIMS. If the chairman of the committee will not bring in that bill for consideration or will not ask for its consideration before Wednesday, then we can finish the water-power bill by Wednesday, if we can have Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday for its uninterrupted consideration.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the bill will be in before Wednesday.

Mr. SIMS. I withdraw my reservation of the right to object.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHEELER. I understood the request of the chairman of the committee is that general debate be continued until 5 o'clock this evening?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to submit to the Chair that the chairman of the committee in his request did not ask that debate be limited to the bill.

The SPEAKER. That was the original limitation.

Mr. LONDON. That was the original limitation presented half an hour ago, but not when he made this last request.

Mr. DENT. Well, it is was not in this request, but it was in the original request at the suggestion of the gentleman from California, and I will have to renew it.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to obstruct the proceedings of the House, but I intended to speak for 15 or 20 minutes on another subject.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if he coupled with his request unanimous consent that the House sit to-morrow until the bill comes to final passage?

The SPEAKER. No; he just gave that intimation.

Mr. DENT. I did not ask for that, but I stated that would be the purpose of those in charge of the bill, to sit to-morrow until the bill is passed.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is the gentleman's intention to sit until the bill is passed to-morrow?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I objected to the three hours because I believed this bill should have a full and free discussion. The present request of the chairman is for four and a half hours instead of three hours, and if it is agreeable to the House I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12731, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12731, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12731) amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask the committee please to allow me to make a brief statement in regard to this bill before any interruptions are made with questions relative to it. It is not a very long bill and it will not take any great length of time to explain what the War Department wanted and what the Military Affairs Committee of the House has reported. Prior, however, to making a statement relative to the substance of the bill itself, in all fairness to the membership of the House, and especially to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, in view of certain criticisms from different quarters of the country that there has been an unnecessary delay in the preparation and report of this bill, I wish to make a brief statement of the real facts. The Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff called me into conference about the first of August and stated to me the program. I asked if it had been put in form, and the reply was that it had not. The Secretary asked me whether the bill should be introduced now in accordance with their plan or whether they should wait until Congress reconvened for work on the 19th of August. I suggested myself to the Secretary that if the plan had been formulated and the bill put in shape I would introduce it at once so that the people of the country would have a chance to digest it before Congress settled down to work on the 19th of August. In accordance with that request, on Friday afternoon, August 2, the War Department sent me a copy of the bill. The House did not meet again till Monday, August 5. On Monday, August 5, I introduced the bill as prepared by the War Department and sent notices to members of the committee that I would begin hearings on the 19th, the day that Congress was expected to return to work. There has never been at any time or under any circumstances any demand or request from the Secretary of War or the War Department that any earlier action should be taken upon this bill. So that the facts are that within less than three weeks after the War Department had formulated a plan to increase the Army by 2,000,000 men and reduce the age limit to 18 and raise it to 45 the Committee on Military Affairs of the House reports a bill for the action of the House. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, and gentleman of the committee, it is somewhat out of the record, but I thought that statement ought to be made in all fairness to everybody concerned. Before I leave that subject, however, let me add this one additional statement. When Gen. Crowder appeared before the committee on Monday last I asked him the question if he had not already proceeded to execute this law as if it had been already enacted, and he answered that he had. Then I asked him the further question, whether or not we would delay the execution of this law if the Committee on Military Affairs did not change the age limits as to registration between 18 and 45 but simply fixed the time or method when men between those ages should be called into the service, and he said it would not. This is manifest.

So much for the charge of delay on an important matter changing the policy of the Government with reference to drafting men in this country and increasing the Army to 5,000,000 men.

Now, Mr. Chairman, coming to the bill itself, let me state in the first place that the House Committee on Military Affairs made five changes in the bill as prepared by the War Department. The first strikes out a provision in the bill exempting declarants of neutral countries from the draft provided they claim their exemption, but carrying a provision to the effect that their declaration shall be null and void and they shall forever hereafter be barred from citizenship in this country. The reason briefly stated as to why the Military Committee was in favor of striking that provision out of the bill is this, that the Military Committee of the House reported several months ago to the House a bill upon that subject, as an independent measure, which has passed this House and is now on the Senate calendar; and I think, and the committee thought, that this is a subject that should be handled by separate and independent legislation, especially in view of the fact that the bill as prepared and presented to the committee would leave in the country a class of residents who could never under any circumstances become citizens of the United States. That briefly is the reason for the action of the committee in that respect.

The next amendment is what is known as the "McKenzie amendment." I will pass that for the present and return to it later.

The committee also struck out of the bill as prepared by the War Department a provision which authorized the President to appoint as members of local boards citizens who did not live within the locality. The reason for that, I think, is too manifest to require explanation.

The fourth amendment of the bill was a provision authorizing by law the appointment of young men between 18 and 21 as officers in the Army, up to the rank of captain. The committee thought, and I am sure the House will agree with the committee, that if we propose to call men between 18 and 21 into the service, we should at least give them an opportunity to earn an officer's commission.

There was added as a fifth proposition to the bill a provision authorizing the Secretary of War to assign enlisted soldiers to educational institutions for special and technical training. That was an amendment suggested at the last moment by the War Department itself. It is the practice of the War Department now and, I think, speaks for itself.

That leaves only for consideration the so-called McKenzie amendment. The bill as drafted by the War Department provided for the conscription of men between the ages of 18 and 45, giving to the President the right and the authority to provide by regulation the sequence in which men between those two ages should be called into the service. Under that, of course, the President could call boys 18 years of age first, if he wished. Under that the President could call men 43 years of age first, if he wished. Under that the President could fix a period of ages which he would call first, and the period of ages which he would call second, and so on down. The McKenzie amendment provides that boys shall be registered and become subject to the service of their country between the ages of 18 and 21, but that those in the 19 class and in the 18 class shall be deferred, and that male citizens within the draft age between 20 and 45 shall be called before those who are in the 19 class, and those in the 19 class called before those in the 18 class.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will ask the gentleman not to interrupt me until I have finished my statement.

The Secretary of War stated when he was before the committee on Monday, after the bill, of course, had been prepared by the War Department, that he was perfectly willing for the committee to write in the bill a provision that the boys in the 18 class—that is, those between 18 and 19—should be called last. So that really the only substantial difference between the committee as to the McKenzie amendment and the Secretary of War is that the McKenzie amendment takes care of the boy between 19 and 20 as well as the boy between 18 and 19. Now, that is the only difference between the Secretary of War and the bill as reported by this committee.

In addition to that, the committee, according to the bill as reported, does not deny to the War Department full power and authority to take every man in the country between 18 and 45 if they need them. The only thing is that the committee thought it just and proper to give the boys that were under 20 years of age an opportunity to attend their schools and business and to get education and training at home while the men older in years were being used in the service. Under this bill as reported by the Committee on Military Affairs those boys are subject to the call of the country and to service in this war. So it does not deprive the War Department of any man power whatever.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman mind being interrupted at this point?

Mr. DENT. I am willing to be interrupted now.

Mr. MONDELL. Did the committee consider this feature of the situation: If the boys between 18 and 20 are not to be called until all others have been called, why have them drawn at all? Why not wait until they are needed? Why classify them if they are not to be utilized?

Mr. DENT. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that it is possible that they may be utilized before the end of this fiscal year. It is possible that they may be drawn into the service. So far as my personal opinion i concerned, I will state in reply to the gentleman, it seems to me that, Congress being in session, we might well wait. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Why weigh all this agony on the minds of the parents of these boys in the fear that they will be called when it is not proposed to call them?

Mr. DENT. It is proposed to call them, I will state to the gentleman, if it is necessary to make this Army an Army of 5,000,000 men.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. It will not hurry the call of these boys to classify them, will it? They will not be called to the colors any quicker by reason of being classified under this bill?

Mr. DENT. They will not be called any quicker.

Mr. REAVIS. Then the classification does not hurry the call of these boys?

Mr. DENT. Not at all.

Mr. MONDELL. Then why classify them?

Mr. STAFFORD and Mr. LAZARO rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield first to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO].

Mr. LAZARO. Just a question for information. Did I understand the chairman to say that the boys between 18 and 20 would not be called until those between 21 and 45 were in class 1?

Mr. DENT. Between 20 and 45.

Mr. LAZARO. Now, what about it when they reach 20? Do they lose that status after they reach 20 or 21?

Mr. DENT. I do not know what the gentleman means. Does he mean the 19-year-old boy when he becomes 20?

Mr. LAZARO. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Of course, he then becomes subject to the draft.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think perhaps the gentleman from Alabama was not entirely plain in his answer. My understanding of the testimony before the committee was that the War Department expected to call all of the men in class 1 who would be reached by this enlargement of the draft just before the 30th of June next year.

Mr. DENT. I stated that, I think.

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not think the gentleman made it very plain.

Mr. DENT. I stated that that was what the War Department anticipated doing. I hope they will not do it.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. LUNN. If I understood you aright with reference to the statement of the Secretary of War when he appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs, it was to the effect that he said the boys of 18 might be called last, and he was willing to have a provision to that effect incorporated in the law. I did not so understand him, but this was the statement he made, and it ought to be in the RECORD somewhere.

Mr. DENT. It is in the RECORD. The statement I made is in the RECORD.

Mr. LUNN. I understood, and I think other members of the committee understood him to say that he was willing to have a provision inserted that the boys of 18 should be called last, so far as practicable, but not to tie the hands of the War Department. That qualification is very important.

Mr. DENT. He did put in that qualifying language.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee for a little information. I am told that none of our allies has drafted boys under 20 years of age. Is that information correct?

Mr. DENT. The committee has been unable to get full and definite information on the subject. The War Department itself does not seem to know, but it does appear that the British Government has recently drafted boys under 19. But the Canadian Government has never gone below 20.

Mr. ROBINSON. You do not know what action our other allies will take?

Mr. DENT. No.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Under the act of last year the British law took all the men from 18 to 41. The act of this year took all the men from 18 to 50, and even up to 55.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Was it not testified to by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff before the committee, speaking for the Military Establishment, that in order to carry out the necessary military plans of the Government it is needful that all available within the range of 18 to 45 be authorized to be called?

Mr. DENT. It certainly was.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then what object could there be in sort of tying the hands of the military authorities by stating to them whether they should take A before they took B, and took B before they took X, and took a white man before a black man? Why impose that on their discretion?

Mr. DENT. The Congress could enact a law to authorize the President of the United States and the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War to take anybody they want to if Congress is willing to surrender its power.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. For a question.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand the bill contemplates raising about 2,000,000 more men. Is that correct?

Mr. DENT. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. MADDEN. That is the plan?

Mr. DENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. Seventeen hundred thousand of these will be raised from the men who are between 18 and 21 years of age?

Mr. DENT. That is according to Gen. Crowder's figures.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; that is the estimate; and not to exceed 600,000 are likely to be raised beyond the age of 31?

Mr. DENT. That is correct. Those are the figures of Gen. Crowder.

Mr. MADDEN. If those estimated figures are correct, does the gentleman think that under the classification proposed in this bill, limiting the right of the Secretary of War to take the men between the ages, say, of 19 and 18 until all the other men are classified above that, the War Department will be able to raise the 2,000,000 men it says it needs?

Mr. DENT. Of course the War Department will take these boys of 18 and 19, if they exhaust the others.

Mr. MADDEN. But they would not be able to start out with the certainty, would they, that they could raise 2,000,000 men?

Mr. DENT. Without invading these classes?

Mr. MADDEN. Without invading those classes.

Mr. DENT. What harm would be done if they invade the classes if necessary?

Mr. MADDEN. The point I wanted to inquire about is whether anything is to be gained by restricting the right of the Military Establishment to utilize the man power provided for in this bill without conditions.

Mr. DENT. I see the gentleman's point, and I am glad to answer it. I intended to come to that proposition a little later.

If the deduction from the figures furnished by Gen. Crowder are correct—and, of course, I know his figures are correct—if the deduction from his figures are correct, then we can only get 600,000 between the ages of 32 and 45. But I do not think the deduction or the method of computation is correct. The mistake that Gen. Crowder makes is in giving credit to all married men between 32 and 45. If you will read Gen. Crowder's statement you will see that he puts in the exempt class every man between 32 and 45, while the Secretary of War stated before the committee that he proposed to use the same exemption rule under this new law as was used under the present law. So that a man would not be exempted simply because he was married. If you exempt all the married men you might get only 600,000, but, of course, under this rule you would not exempt them all.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me ask the gentleman one more question.

Mr. DENT. Very well.

Mr. MADDEN. If the calculations made by the Judge Advocate General are correct—and let us assume for the sake of the argument that they are—that would compel the Military Establishment, would it not, to begin the organization of its new forces from the men above 31 and between 20 and 21?

Mr. DENT. That is true; but it would not stop the registration of those under 18.

Mr. MADDEN. I realize that; but the point I want to get at is this—I did not get through asking my question—that would be a source of embarrassment, perhaps, if they wanted to raise 2,000,000 men and the restrictions made it possible for them to raise only a million men. Why should we put any restrictions around them? Why not let them regulate the conditions as the importance of the situation justifies?

Mr. DENT. Of course, the only answer to that is that Congress has some right to express its opinion as to how men should be drafted who are going to be drafted under the law.

Mr. MADDEN. I recognize that.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. SEARS. As I recall, the first bill presented by the War Department provided for the drafting of the men from 19 to 45.

Mr. DENT. From 19 to 25.

Mr. SEARS. This bill is from 18 to 21, and 21 to 45. As I recall reading the hearings, either Gen. Crowder or Gen. March stated that they expected all these drafted men to be in France by next June. Suppose they are all called into service in this country, what assurance have we that 18-year-old boys and 19-year-old boys will not be sent to France, as originally intended by the War Department, before the 31 to 45 year old men in this country are sent?

Mr. DENT. You would have this assurance, I will state to the gentleman from Florida: If you pass the bill as reported by the committee, and the War Department can raise a sufficient number of men without invading this class, which they have to go into last, then the boys will not be called. That is the object of the law.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. I can not hear myself talk, let alone hearing what the gentleman is saying. I hope the committee will be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. CANNON. I want to express the hope that gentlemen all around me who are discussing this bill will listen to the gentleman who has the floor. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] I will say that the Secretary of War and Gen. Crowder have already testified before the committee that they are going to do the very thing which the bill proposes. Gen. Crowder said:

> We have already classified the 31 men; it runs from 32 to 36, inclusive.
> Secretary BAKER. And the other——
> Gen. CROWDER. Is the 19 and 20 class.
> Secretary BAKER. So that the regulations at present being formulated look to making a single class of men from 19 to 36, inclusive.
> The CHAIRMAN. That is the class you expect to draw from first?
> Secretary BAKER. Yes.

So the War Department's policy proposes to do exactly the thing which it is proposed to do in this bill.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. I understood the chairman to state that Gen. Crowder and the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War had stated to the membership of the committee that they had no objection to writing into the bill a provision deferring the calling of the 18-year-old boys until the last. Is that correct?

Mr. DENT. That is correct. I accept the qualification that the gentleman from New York, a member of the committee [Mr. LUNN], stated that he would like to have the language put in there "as far as practicable"; but then that is the substance of what they said.

Mr. DEWALT. Does the Secretary of War now object to that provision being in the bill, to wit, that men from 18 to 19 shall be deferred?

Mr. DENT. He does not, so far as I know, and I have no reason to believe he has changed his mind.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. On page 4 of the hearing I find this statement by Secretary Baker:

> I therefore have planned from the beginning, as a matter of regulation, to have the men from 18 to 19 put in a separate class, calling them the class of 18-year-old men, with a view to deferring their call until it is necessary.

Then he states further—

> I can see no objection to putting into the bill a provision that will make of the 18 to 19 year men a separate class to be called after the others, so far as practicable.

Then on page 5——

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman had better read right on. Read the rest of that.

Mr. RAKER. He says:

> So that my judgment is that it is perfectly proper to put in the bill a provision which will make a separate class of the men from 18 to 19, to be called, so far as practicable, after the exhaustion of the remaining number in class 1.

Is this the statement that the gentleman from Alabama, chairman of the committee, refers to?

Mr. DENT. That is the statement I refer to.

Mr. RAKER. And the committee have simply made another class from 19 to 20?

Mr. DENT. Yes; except that the committee——

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Wait a moment. Let me be fair about this. Except that the committee refused to take the language that he suggested—

So far as practicable—

Because that would have made the whole thing meaningless.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GILLETT. Did not that language—

So far as practicable—

Very distinctly limit his statement? Because close to the top of page 5 he states and illustrates at length why he put in that language—

So far as practicable—

And it seems to me that practically negatives the statement that the gentleman made that the Secretary of War is content with such a provision.

Mr. DENT. I stated just now—I do not know that the gentleman from Massachusetts heard me—that if you put in the words—

So far as practicable—

It would destroy the effect of the law.

Mr. GILLETT. Exactly, and the Secretary says he would not be satisfied unless those words were in.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In view of what has just been stated, I want to ask the gentleman this question: Is this House to understand that the President and the Secretary of War favor the bill as reported by the committee, or are they opposed to it? Can the gentleman give us that direct information?

Mr. DENT. I think the gentleman understands the position I have stated without my personally answering the question. The War Department submitted a certain bill to us. The committee amended it in five different points. The McKenzie amendment was not suggested by the War Department, but so far as I know since the bill has been reported I have had no complaint from the War Department as to that amendment. Of course, they did not put it in, and I assume that they did not want it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman would give the House to understand that the War Department is opposed to the amendment?

Mr. DENT. I am only drawing the conclusion from the fact that they did not have it in the bill that they had.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. McCULLOCH. In considering the sources of man power in making the estimates, did your committee take into consideration the aliens of the cobelligerent countries that will be available under the legislation recently passed?

Mr. DENT. Yes; those figures, I think, are in Gen. Crowder's statement. They are not very large.

Mr. McCULLOCH. What do they amount to?

Mr. DENT. My recollection is somewhere about 50,000, in the class between 32 and 45. I am by no means certain about this.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The number of such men registered under the last draft was 772,744, according to Gen. Crowder's report.

Mr. DENT. I do not remember the number and I will have to look at the report to see what figures, if any, were presented.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Is it not true that under this act the registration provided for there will be probably 2,000,000 aliens of cobelligerent countries available for service?

Mr. DENT. I confess that I am not familiar with the figures.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The information I desire to get is whether or not the committee in considering the proposed increase of ages and the reservoir of man power have taken into consideration the aliens who have not been drafted and taken into the service, although we have been in the war and had conscription over a year and a half.

Mr. DENT. There was some consideration given this matter, but we had no definite information upon the subject.

Mr. McCULLOCH. It is very important, is it not, that your committee should give that some attention?

Mr. DENT. It was given consideration as far as we had the facts and figures.

Mr. McCULLOCH. To what extent will aliens of cobelligerent countries be available.

Mr. DENT. I have stated emphatically that I do not remember any definite figures, and I doubt if they can be obtained.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I am considering offering an amendment, and if the gentleman will get the figures and put them in the RECORD, I should like to have him do so.

Mr. DENT. I will do so, if I can.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. ANDERSON. The last sentence of the McKenzie amendment reads like this:

All registrants of the age of 20 years and above on the day fixed by the President for registration shall be called prior to those in the classes hereby created.

The word "registrants" includes those in the deferred classification as well as in class 1, and under this limitation it would not be possible to call anybody under the age of 20 until you had called all the classes of the higher ages.

Mr. DENT. I had not thought about that, but I think the gentleman's criticism is worthy of consideration.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. ROSE. Going back to the question put by the gentleman from Ohio, it seems to me that it might be valuable information to the House if the gentleman could state to the House whether the McKenzie amendment had been submitted to the War Department.

Mr. DENT. No; the committee does not submit amendments to the War Department. The committee exercises a little independence and judgment sometimes itself. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. If the McKenzie amendment is adopted, would that not operate to prevent the training in this country of many young men 18 or 19 years of age until after all men above that age had been called?

Mr. DENT. The gentleman means military training?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Not at all. There are 140 colleges in this country that have adopted military training, and this amendment provides for sending enlisted men to the different schools, the War Department paying for it. They are filling the schools with young men all the time for training purposes, and the colleges are taking advantage of the military training under Army discipline.

Mr. HUSTED. It would prevent the compulsory military training in this country of men 18 and 19 years of age until all the other men are called.

Mr. DENT. I do not know of any law that authorizes compulsory military training.

Mr. HUSTED. If this bill was passed in the form presented by the War Department and boys of 18 and 19 years of age were called and sent to the cantonments, then they would be compulsorily trained.

Mr. DENT. If this bill was passed; but I said I did not know of any such law on the subject, and I am opposed to any such law.

Mr. HUSTED. Is the gentleman opposed to the proposition of training young men in this country of 18 and 19 years of age as soon as, in the judgment of the War Department, it is necessary?

Mr. DENT. I am opposed to compulsory training of them; yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. It seems to me there is a lot of buncombe in the talk about the McKenzie amendment delaying in the slightest the calling of men of all ages mentioned in the amendment. Now, I want to submit a question. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of War or the Provost Marshal General could call successively all the classes down to 18 years old five minutes apart, as fast as he could write the orders, if he needed the men?

Mr. DENT. Unquestionably; if he needed the men.

Mr. ANTHONY. So all this talk about delay is a wasted effort.

Mr. DENT. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understood the chairman of the committee to state that the Provost Marshal General estimated that he could get 600,000 men between the ages of 31 and 45?

Mr. DENT. Thirty-two to forty-five.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Secretary of War stated that he proposed to put into effect the same regulations with reference to drafting married men that now exist. Did the committee make any estimate as to the number of men that would be available under that regulation between the ages of 31 and 45?

Mr. DENT. That is purely a matter of speculation. I stated a little while ago, in answer to an inquiry from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], that Gen. Crowder's figures were inconclusive to the committee and to me because of the fact that he put in the exempted class absolutely every married man between the ages of 32 and 45, when the Secretary said that would not be done. How many married men there are in the country between those two ages who have no people dependent upon them the committee has no means of absolutely ascertaining, and no one else has. That is a matter, of course, that must be ascertained after the law is put into effect. But the committee is of the opinion that Gen. Crowder's figures will be found to be incorrect, and that a very much larger number of men will be obtained between those ages than Gen. Crowder estimated.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The practical operation of the McKenzie amendment, as I understand it, is about this: Not to prevent the War Department from calling boys of 18 years of age, but to provide, if there is a surplus of man power beyond what the department needs, that the 18-year-old boys shall stay at home instead of the 45-year-old men. Is not that correct?

Mr. DENT. Absolutely correct.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. HAMILL. The newspapers this morning all seemed to agree upon the fact that the Secretary of War and the Provost Marshal General are opposed to this amendment making an 18 and 19 year old class. I did not get clearly the answer of the chairman, and I want to know if that statement is incorrect.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I have stated several times that the Secretary of War stated before the committee that he has no objection to the committee writing into the bill a provision classifying boys beween 18 and 19, to be drawn last, as far as practicable, but the Secretary did not go so far as to say that he was willing that that age should go up to 20, so that the difference between the committee and the War Department is that the committee adopts the preferential age of 18 to 20 and the War Department 18 to 19.

Mr. HAMILL. Is this, then, a correct statement of the opinion of the chairman, that the Secretary is willing that there be an 18-year-old deferred class and that that is definitely agreed to by him, but that so far as a 19-year-old class is concerned that is the judgment of the committee?

Mr. DENT. That is correctly stated, as I understand it.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I understood the situation about the McKenzie amendment to be this—and I will ask the chairman if I am not correct—that you can not call men under the classes there specified in the amendment until all of the men over 32 have been called, and if Gen. Crowder has not stated that in order to classify the men from 32 to 45 it will require at least 100 days, and that, therefore, if you adopt this amendment it will delay the calling and the training of the young men until those men have been classified and that time has expired?

Mr. DENT. I will say in answer to the gentleman that I do not remember whether Gen. Crowder said 100 days or not.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I have his testimony.

Mr. DENT. But I am sure the gentleman has his figures correct. He did say that it would take a long time to classify them. That is one of the principal reasons why the committee wants the McKenzie amendment adopted, so that they will classify and take these men before they take the young men. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Let me call attention to this fact, that of the 18-year-old men there are only 600,000, and that of the men from 32 to 45 there are 600,000. You, therefore, delay the training and classification of these young men until the 600,000 from 32 to 45 are called and classified, whereas, if this amendment is not adopted, those men can be called whenever the President thinks it proper to put them in training and be ready for service whenever the country needs them.

Mr. DENT. I am sure the gentleman from Virginia, a member of the committee, does not mean to state that in the registration and questionnaire there is going to be a different time and a different date for classifying those from 18 to 45. It will be done at the same time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it not all being done in advance of the law?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. The difference, as I understand it, is that there are 14 classes over the ages of 32, and that there are a great many of them married men, there are a great many of them associated with the industries of the country, and that to undertake to classify these men would involve a long and laborious work upon the part of the Provost Marshal General, whereas as to the younger men very few of them are married and very few are synchronized, as they use the term, with the industries of the country.

Mr. DENT. I agree to the statement——

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Would it not, therefore, take a long time to classify them?

Mr. DENT. I agree to the general statement of the gentleman from Virginia, and everybody is bound to agree to that, that it will take longer to classify those men who are married and have children, to determine whether they have dependents, than it will to determine in respect to those who have none. I agree to that, but the gentleman will recall that when Gen. March, Chief of Staff, was on the stand I asked him how long it would be before he would exhaust class 1 under the present law, and he said it would be some time in November.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I want to call attention to another point, and that is that Gen. Crowder or Gen. March—I forget which one—has testified that these 18-year-old men being called for service last will be retained in this country last, and that, as it is the proposition to retain a million men here in this country in the cantonments, these men naturally will be retained in the cantonments while the older men are sent to Europe.

Mr. GORDON. And what is the gentleman's objection to the amendment?

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. Can the chairman tell us if the War Department, in increasing the Army to the size they now intend to increase it, would require immediately all men of 18 and 19?

Mr. DENT. Immediately?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. DENT. The War Department's figures state that it intends to get 5,000,000 men. There are 3,000,000 in the Army now, so in order to get the additional 2,000,000 men between now and the 20th of next June they would have to invade all of the classes between 18 and 45 if this law is passed.

Mr. EMERSON. So they would call the 18 and 19 men anyway.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was there any inquiry made by the committee as to the feasibility or advisability of invading class 2, between 21 and 31, those married men who, though they may have a child and wife, are not dependent on their husbands, before taking the youths of 18 and 19?

Mr. DENT. Yes; the committee took up that question and asked a good many questions about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the bill recommended by the department, they are virtually exhausting under the present classification all man power for fighting purposes. Has any testimony been taken as to what the policy of the department is to be in case the war continues and they get 2,000,000 men by invading the 18-year-old-boy class, of getting an additional increment later on?

Mr. DENT. From other sources?

Mr. STAFFORD. From other classes.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman means from the other classes?

Mr. STAFFORD. Say from class 2. The point is, Has the committee inquired as to the advisability for the welfare of the country that class 2 men, having been trained and educated, though married, should be called to the colors prior to the boys of 18 who are not mature and have not had the training they should have?

Mr. DENT. Yes; that matter has been considered, but the committee has taken no action.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the position of the department in regard to the inquiries directed to that question?

Mr. DENT. The only answer I can make as to their position is what they are actually doing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Do I understand, now, we have an Army of about 3,000,000 men?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A large part of which was raised by the 21 to 31 draft and taken from class 1?

Mr. DENT. That is true, except as to the volunteer force.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If that is the case, in order to put 2,000,000 additional men into the Army, why not start with the men of the age of 20 and raise the age to 45 or even 47, if necessary, and get the 2,000,000 with less trouble than was had before in order to get the first 3,000,000 men, and do it without taking mere striplings?

Mr. DENT. I think that can be done without any trouble. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think this House ought to do it.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. DENISON. I think the chairman of the committee made a mistake awhile ago in answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], and I think it was done inadvertently.

Mr. DENT. I may have misunderstood him.

Mr. DENISON. This McKenzie amendment only affects priority of call to the service, that is all.

Mr. DENT. That is all; I thought that was the gentleman's question.

Mr. DENISON. It has nothing to do with priority of sending men to France?

Mr. DENT. Nothing in the world.

Mr. DENISON. So, even if we pass the bill as reported by the committee, with the McKenzie amendment in, the department can call all the young men of 18 years of age last and can send them abroad first, if it desires to do so?

Mr. DENT. Unquestionably, under the law.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I desire to ask what investigation the committee has made with regard to the class of men who are engaged in the industries necessary to the prosecution of the war who have been placed in class 4 who are not continuously employed? For instance, I have been advised here in Washington, where the Government is engaged in building some buildings for housing purposes, men who are at work putting on lath receive a maximum of $19 a day on a Government cost-plus contract, and that some of those men do not work five days in a month. They get this big pay and they quit work until their money is exhausted. They are draft age and they ought to be in the trenches. [Applause.] What investigation has the committee made in regard to these slackers, who are of draft age under the present law, not being placed where they belong? [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman that a great deal of criticism has been brought to the attention of the committee and the different members of the committee along that line, and that the committee has asked many questions of the War Department upon that subject, but the gentleman must realize that after all it is a question of administration, and it is almost impossible for Congress, by way of legislation, to control an administrative matter.

Mr. GOOD. I understand that; but has not the War Department dome something to bring that class of slackers into the service, where they belong?

Mr. DENT. I do not know any more about that than the gentleman does.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is in a position where, I think, he may know more.

Another question that I wish to be clear about: As I recall, when the first draft measure was before the House here and before the committee the fact was disclosed that the War Department wanted the boys of 18 and 19 called first. Subsequently they changed their view and were willing that the boys of 18 should not be dropped out, but they wanted the boys of 19 called first. Is that correct?

Mr. DENT. The gentleman is correct, so far as I recollect, to this extent, that the War Department wanted the young men from 19 to 25, inclusive. But I do not think there has ever been any proposition submitted for the 18-year-old boy to be taken, up to this time.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. The 19 to 25 proposition was presented to the committee by the Secretary of War, who testified that it was his intention, if Congress gave him the power, to raise the first million men under the draft authorized in the bill from men 19 and 20 years of age. Is that true?

Mr. DENT. I am not absolutely sure as to this. The gentleman from Ohio has a good memory, and my recollection is that the original proposition of the War Department, by limiting the ages from 19 to 25, stated its intention to take men of the lower ages first in order to raise the draft Army to 500,000 and the additional force to 1,000,000 men.

Mr. PLATT. I want to ask the gentleman if the committee has inquired into the ages of the men in the Regular Army and the National Guard and the National Army? I am informed by Army officers that the fighting part of the Regular Army, not including the Quartermaster's Corps, is composed almost wholly of men under 20 years of age. There are whole companies where there is not a man over 20 years.

Mr. DENT. We had some information on that subject, but it was very indefinite. We were unable to find out exactly what it was, although my recollection is that the best information of the War Department was that they were above 21.

Mr. PLATT. Men have been allowed to enlist in the Army who were under 18. It is all nonsense to call men of 18 babies, when the Civil War was fought by men almost wholly of 20 years or under.

Mr. DENT. Is it not different to take a man of 18 by volunteering rather than take him by force?

Mr. PLATT. Then you take him on his own enthusiasm. He may volunteer when he may not wish to be drafted.

Mr. MONDELL. Did the committee go into the question of combing out the men already registered, with the view of getting more eligibles? My State furnished 55 per cent of all her registered men in class 1, and they are now with the colors—55 per cent of all the registered men. There are States of the Union where the men in class 1 only amount to 13 per cent of the registered men. Why not comb out and reclassify and get those slackers that are now registered before we tear these boys from their mothers' arms and send them over? [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] in response to his question to the chairman of the committee, that we did have that matter up in the committee and I had an amendment prepared. I questioned the Secretary of War in regard to the revocation of these hundreds and thousands of exemptions, and he said that it would produce chaos. I have no doubt it would produce chaos in some of the offices here in Washington and other places where these gentleman are.

Mr. GREGG. If this bill passes, the entire man power, and boy power, too, for that matter, will be drafted in the Army. What is to become of the Navy and the Marine Corps?

Mr. DENT. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that when Gen. March and the Secretary of War called me into conference on this bill I asked what would be the policy as to enlistments in the Navy and Marine Corps, stating that while I originally favored the volunteer against the conscript system, that when Congress adopted the draft system I thought it ought to apply to the Army and the Navy and the Marine Corps alike, because you can never eradicate from the American mind the distinction betwen a man that voluntarily fights and a man that is forced to fight. And I think there ought not to be any distinction.

The Senate Military Committee took the matter up with the Navy Department and the department absolutely refused to have the law changed, saying that they were getting along all right under the volunteer system and had practically a half million men in the Navy now, and it would disrupt and disorganize the system if we changed the law. Admiral Palmer so testified before the Senate Military Committee.

Mr. GREGG. Now, they may need more men later on. Suppose they want them, where are you going to get them?

Mr. GORDON. Out of the deferred classes.

Mr. GREGG. Are you not putting in the power of the War Department the right to dictate and control the size of the Navy and the Marine Corps?

Mr. DENT. Of course that would be a matter of agreement and coordination between the two departments, which the Secretary said he thought could be handled without any trouble.

Mr. GREGG. Could any man be transferred from the Army to the Navy without consent of the War Department?

Mr. DENT. Under this bill?

Mr. GREGG. Yes.

Mr. DENT. No; I do not think he could.

Mr. GREGG. Is not that virtually giving to the War Department the power to control the size of the Navy and Marine Corps?

Mr. DENT. That is the effect of it; but, of course, the two departments will have an understanding in regard to that.

Mr. GREGG. Suppose they do have an understanding——

Mr. DENT. They are all under the President.

Mr. GOOD. In view of the fact that there seems to be some misunderstanding as to exactly what the language in the proposed McKenzie amendment means with relation to the use of the word "draft," I want to ask the chairman of the committee——

Mr. GARD. I desire to ask whether the committee has considered, or whether the chairman would now consider, the propriety of such an amendment as I will read, in lieu of the so-called McKenzie amendment:

That registrants who on the date fixed by the President for registration are of the age of 18 years and not over 20 years shall be called into such service and at such time as ordered by the President.

It would seem to me that that might safely include that the President might order the training of young men of the ages of 18 and 19, and they are called into so-called active military service other than in the training camps, to be determined by the emergency and the necessity of the occasion, to be evidenced by the proclamation of the President, who is the Commander in Chief of the Army.

Mr. DENT. If the McKenzie amendment is rejected the gentleman's amendment will be unnecessary. Of course, the President can do that under the law as proposed by the War Department. He can call boys of 18 and 19 whenever he gets ready, after the call of those above that age.

Mr. GARD. But into such service as the President might require.

Mr. DENT. That means the same thing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, unless some special question is desired to be asked——

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Is it not a fact that we enlist men in the Army of 18 without the consent of their parents, and that we have recruiting officers all over the country who are recruiting boys without the consent of their parents, and that advertisements appear in the papers bearing the heading "Volunteer"? In that case what is the use of having any sentiment about drafting when we are luring them away from home to volunteer?

Mr. DENT. If the gentleman can not understand the distinction between drafting and volunteering I can not inform him.

Mr. PLATT. The Government simply contracts with infants 18 years of age.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman does not mean to say that the present draft act is not entirely agreeable to the whole country to-day, does he?

Mr. DENT. I do not see how the gentleman can get any notion that I said any such thing. I said that originally I favored the volunteer system, but that Congress had adopted the other system.

Mr. SNYDER. I will say to the gentleman that up in my section of the country the draft act is acting splendidly, and we are not much disturbed about the 18-year-old feature.

Mr. DENT. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to put into the RECORD anything as quoting me that the draft was a failure. I expressed no such opinion.

Mr. SNYDER. Up in my country we are satisfied with this spread of ages between 18 and 45, because we are not much disturbed about the 18-year-old boy. The 18-year-old boys there are nearly all in the Army now, and I think you will find that pretty general throughout the country.

Mr. DENT. Unless there is some special question, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that I am again compelled to be in opposition to the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LUNN. You refer to the majority by number?

Mr. KAHN. To the majority.

Mr. LUNN. Not by faith?

Mr. KAHN. The Chief of Staff, who was before us, made this unanswerable statement: "The only way in which Germany can be whipped is by America going into this thing with her whole strength." [Applause.] And that is the problem that we are called upon to face to-day. Going into this thing with all our strength will materially shorten the war and will ultimately save the lives of thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands of 18-year-old boys. [Applause.]

In matters of this kind I think it wise to defer to the opinion of those men who, by reason of their experience and education in the military service of the country, are charged with the duty of winning this war. I, for one, will not set up my opinion—a layman's opinion—the opinion of a civilian who has not studied military tactics—against their opinion. The Secretary of War, Gen. March, the Chief of Staff, and the Provost Marshal General all stated to the committee unequivocally that in order to win this war we must take the young men from 18 years and those up to 45 years. My own personal predilection was the other way. Personally, I wanted to conserve the strength of the young men of this country till the final blows were to be delivered. I did not think it wise, originally, to take the 18-year-old young man. But when I have the opinion of these military authorities that they are absolutely necessary for the speedy winning of the war, I throw my own personal views into the scrap heap and abide by the judgment of these military authorities.

Gen. March stated that the present program contemplates the formation of 98 divisions. Eighty of those divisions are expected to be on the other side of the Atlantic by the 30th of June, 1919. Approximately 4,000,000 men serving in the American forces will be "over there" on the western front in the next nine months, and the General stated that with that force the Americans will be able to break through the German lines at any time and at any place that they desire. [Applause.] And he stated further that in his opinion it meant the winning of the war next year. Therefore I for one am not willing to withhold the force that the military authorities ask for at this time if it is going to win the war for us in the coming year.

The chairman of the committee stated several times that the Secretary of War would not object to writing into the law a general provision to take the 18-year-old boys last. But the Secretary of War, every time he made the statement, qualified it with the phrase "so far as practicable." That, of course, would have given the authorities in the War Department the right to call them if they thought it was necessary. He repeated the limitation time and again, "so far as practicable;" and I say for myself that I would have no objection either to writing into the law such a provision if that limiting clause, "so far as practicable," can be added to the phraseology.

Mr. SIMS. As to both 18 and 19?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly; 18 and 19, "so far as practicable," because that in effect leaves the provision, so far as its purport is concerned, the same at it was in the bill when it came to us from the War Department. And we have the statement of the Secretary of War that so far as it can be done they will call the 18-year-old boys last. So far as it can be done, they will take those older boys and then take the others last.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Not now. But if some military exigency should require the taking of the younger boys first, I for one do not propose to tie the hands of the authorities and prevent them from using the men in our forces as the military authorities think it best to use them.

Mr. RAKER. Now, will my colleague yield for a question right there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. If that is a fact, must not the War Department classify all of these men to start with; in other words, the 15,000,000 men?

Mr. KAHN. They contemplate classifying everybody that will be registered under this law. The boys of 18, 19, and 20, the men from 32 to 45, all will be classified. That is the intention of the War Department.

Mr. RAKER. Will my colleague yield for another question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Supposing there were 600,000 between 32 and 45. Suppose they call them out first. Could they not take those from 20 to 21 the next month, and those from 19 to 20 the next month, and those from 18 to 19 the next month? Could they not get them all within three months just the same?

Mr. KAHN. The Provost Marshal General stated to the committee that it would take many more weeks to classify the men from 32 to 45 than it would the younger men, because of their relationship to the industries of the country and their domestic relationships. He said positively, as I recall, that it would take some months to finish their classification, whereas the other would be much speedier, by reason of the fact that the young men had not so many ties.

Mr. RAKER. Just one other question.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Then the question of classification and the time must mean the time that it will take the exemption boards to dispose of them.

Mr. KAHN. That is undoubtedly true. The Provost Marshal General further stated that of course the action of the boards must necessarily be unequal in the different States. Some of the States get the returns in very rapidly. Other States get the returns in quite slowly. So that after all, even under this very system, some of the young men will be called from some of the States to go to the cantonments much earlier than they will be called from other States, because of those differences which you can not prevent and those little inequalities that must necessarily arise in trying to put into effect a law of this magnitude.

Now, Gen. March stated frankly to the committee what the program is with reference to getting these soldiers to France. I read from page 31 of the House hearings:

Gen. MARCH. The fact of the matter is that in order to carry through the 80-division program in France by June 30, 1919, we will need substantially every man we can obtain in class 1 from 18 to 45 years, inclusive—every single man—and we must not delude ourselves with the idea that the 18 and 19 year men are going to be deferred, if you want to put it in that way, for a considerable length of time. If you will go over the figures you will see that we will have to have those men in the early spring, anyway, in order to give them the training and get them over in France.

That is the statement of the Chief of Staff of our Army. Is his advice worth listening to? Is he competent? The President, the Commander in Chief, has confidence in him. He is charged with the duty of preparing our forces over here for the ultimate victory. Do you propose to put stumbling blocks in his way and then still hold him responsible to the country for winning this war?

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. The Chief of Staff, however, did not mean to convey the idea by that statement that the man power of the Nation would be exhausted by that time. Am I correct?

Mr. KAHN. The statement of the Chief of Staff speaks for itself. He said it is absolutely necessary to get these men over there.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. Did not the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] ask the Chief of Staff, "In other words, when you call this class the man power of the Nation will be practically exhausted"? And the Chief of Staff laughed at him and said "No." [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Everybody knows that, in the final analysis, if everything goes against us, we will have to take the men in class 2, we will have to take the men in class 3, we will have to take the men in class 4; but we do not want at present to shut up our industries. We do not want to take those men in industries and occupations necessary for the winning of the war unless we have to take them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman thinks it is all right to let many of the baseball players and theater employees and chauffeurs remain in deferred classifications, but to shut up the schools and take the schoolboys?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, the gentleman is offering a gratuitous statement, which I will refute at the proper time. I have here the report of the Commissioner of Education, who said in his annual report of 1917 that out of 1,000 boys and girls who entered the first elementary class in 1906 only 117 of them are left at 18 years of age to graduate from the high school, so that the percentage of students who go to the high schools is comparatively so small that it does not cut a figure in this great question involving our country's well-being and welfare.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it not a fact that of the boys who graduate from the high schools more than one-half of them are 18 years of age?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know whether they are or not. I think I have the figures and will try to insert them at the proper time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The amendment in this bill provides that the Secretary of War shall designate certain of these drafted 18 and 19 year old boys for school.

Mr. KAHN. I favor——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If 1 boy in 50 that is drafted is sent to school, what will the parents of the others say?

Mr. KAHN. I propose to meet this question as one Member of Congress by calling to the attention of my constituents that the welfare of my country comes before any individual's welfare. [Loud applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. War hysteria is not necessary for the welfare of the country.

Mr. KAHN. I fear the gentleman from Washington is suffering from the hysteria.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I am not.

Mr. KAHN. I will leave that to the House to judge. Now, some statements have been made respecting the attitude of our cobelligerent nations. Great Britain passed the military service act of May 25, 1916, whereby all men, whether married or single, were eligible to military service from 18 years to 41 years.

They found that did not produce the necessary man power and therefore they followed it up by the act of April 18, 1918, this very year, under which they raised the age to 50 years, with the possible extension to 55 years. I get that information from the Statesman's Yearbook of 1918, page 50.

Some Members say that France has not yet come down to 18 years. I believe that is quite true. France has called her 19-year-old men and they are now serving with the colors. Mr. Prudhomme, of the French High Commission, informed me only day before yesterday that they contemplate putting their 18-year-old men in next November. But the fact remains—the lamentable fact remains—that Germany is on French soil. Perhaps it would have been well for France if she had used her 18-year-old boys earlier in order to have driven back the German invader across the French border.

This country proposes to learn something from the mistakes of the cobelligerent nations. We see where they have fallen down, and we are trying to shape our legislation so that we shall not fall into the errors that they have committed.

Does anyone doubt, anyone who has studied the war in all its bearings, that if England and France at the very beginning had called out their entire man power to fight the enemy that this war would not have ended long before this? No; they made these mistakes of procrastination in calling out their man power, which some of the gentlemen on this floor are trying to repeat at this time in this country. The allies went at the thing piecemeal. They took a million of men, for instance, this six months, another million or a million and a half six months later, and still another million six months further on. We propose to furnish the man power now and finish it up as speedily as possible. That is the difference in the programs. [Applause.] France now has taken the men from 18 years, beginning this fall, and includes those to 48. Italy is taking the men now from 18 to 44, practically the same as we contemplate doing by our program.

But what has been Germany's program during all this time? It is said that Germany—and I speak not of the central powers, but of Germany—Germany has brought 10,000,000 of her men to the western front. Did Germany stop at 18? Let me state the facts. Liability to military service in Germany in peace times begins at 17 and runs up to 45, although service with the colors in the field army of Germany in peace times does not begin until the young man is 20. But that is in peace times, and the service in the field army of Germany lasts until the young man is 30. After that he goes into their various reserves.

Under the war expansion program of Germany, by December, 1916, the whole of the 1917 class of recruits had been incorporated into the army; and by May, 1917, lads were entering the army in their seventeenth year. Gen. March stated before the committee that among the German prisoners being taken on the western front were boys who are scarcely more than 16 years of age.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is it not a fact that every one of the nations the gentleman has mentioned are calling boys of 18, but in every case they are called last; they are not called until the other men are called ahead of them?

Mr. KAHN. I believe they did not call a single man below 20 before this war commenced. They did not go to the later ages of 19 and 18 until the war had been on for some time. But now they have all come to it. I say it was probably a military mistake on their part in having failed to come to the lower ages first, because if they had put forward all their man power they probably would have avoided many defeats which they have suffered.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is it not the gentleman's opinion that the judgment of the military staff of France is equal to that of any other military nation of the world, and that they opposed the calling of 18-year-old men, although Germany has been at the heart of France for four years?

Mr. KAHN. There is no man in this House or in the world who gives higher credit or greater honor to the military leaders of France than I do. What they have done in this war has challenged the admiration of mankind, and all the ages will gladly pay honor to the French soldier for his heroic deeds and his willingness to make stupendous sacrifices in the face of a powerful and a relentless foe; but the French officer has finally come to the conclusion that he must call his 18-year-old boys now to win this war. And we instead of waiting until the last want to raise the necessary forces to win this war and avoid the shedding of human blood as speedily as possible by taking as a military necessity the boys of 18 and 19 now. [Applause.]

We are in a great world war. These wars seem to come in cycles. The last world war we had was the Napoleonic war, a little over a hundred years ago. They come in cycles separated by periods of from 100 to 200 years. It is in world wars that the great loss of human life is encountered, and we are in the midst of probably the greatest of those wars now. Our country has become involved in it.

What is to be our part in it? Is it to be the part of a giant or are we to play the part of a pigmy in this war? For God's sake, let us meet our obligations like men. Let our Nation be a giant among the giant nations, and then we will be doing our duty as legislators, our duty to our country, our duty to mankind, and our sacred duty to the cause of civilization. That is why I am advocating this legislation to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. OLNEY. Is it not a fact also that in the French and Italian war ranks there is no such thing as deferred classification, and that in the English law there is no such thing as deferred classification except as to agriculture and industry, and that is why the allied nations are now compelled to come down to the 18-year-old classes?

Mr. KAHN. I believe my colleague is entirely correct in the matter.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. The gentleman spoke of the English raising the age to 50 years and possibly 55.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. And also we know that the Germans have been using men of that age. Has the gentleman any statistics or any way of determining whether a soldier of, say, 45 or 50 years of age is equal to a soldier 18 years old on the battle field?

Mr. KAHN. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. There was a difference of opinion as to the ability of older men to fight before this world war was entered upon; but the men who are charged with the duty of raising troops for the various belligerent nations all contend, I believe, that for trench fighting the older man is in many ways the equal of the younger man. For open fighting, I dare say, the younger man is much more serviceable, because the older man can not endure the long, hard marches. There is comparatively little marching in the style of warfare that is being indulged in in this war. An older man can doubtless stay in the trenches and do as well as a younger man. But if ever the enemy is routed from the trenches and we have an enormous force of young men to keep constantly driving him so that he will have to keep retreating, without a chance to entrench himself again, then I say the value of the younger man is enormous as compared to the older man.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman does that, will he permit me to say, further, that I ascertained from the Provost Marshal General's office this morning that in the United States there will be available between the ages of 41 and 45 only 126,000 men considered to be in the soldier class.

Mr. KAHN. I think the report of the Provost Marshal General, incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 5, will show those figures in detail.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. As I understand the gentleman, his contention is that France, Germany, and England in waiting to call the 18-year-old boys until the last committed a great military mistake.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; on the part of England and France.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. When we consider that Germany is the first military nation of the world, that France is a close second, that the English themselves are not in any way contemptible, does not the gentleman think that supreme sentiments of humanity actuated them in keeping the children for the last rather than putting them in at first?

Mr. KAHN. I object to the word "children."

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will we then not be charged with being lacking in sentiment if we, before we have exhausted the manhood of the country, send the children into the trenches right away?

Mr. KAHN. I again object to the use of the word "children." The trouble probably is that the English and the French and also the Italians, who are an emotional people, as well as ourselves, have had a considerable sentiment against taking the young men. But the more I study the question the more I am convinced that war is not a matter of sentiment; that it is a practical, a deadly practical proposition. In war sentiment is frequently wiped away, and it would seem that the nation that wipes sentiment away and looks upon war as a practical question is the nation that generally has reaped the victory.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Has not Germany acted upon the principle of wiping out sentiment and being severely practical?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; and to-day she occupies all of Belgium, practically. To-day she occupies all of Serbia. To-day she occupies all of Montenegro. To-day she occupies a good part of northern France. And we, by looking upon this matter as a practical one and not as a sentimental question, propose to drive Germany back across the Rhine, because we are going to deal with her as she has been dealing with the rest of humanity in this war heretofore. [Applause.]

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield further.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. NOLAN. I would like to ask my colleague if there is any sentiment in this country against the boy who volunteers at 18 years of age. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Yes; there is a great deal of sentiment; one of commendation. [Applause.]

Mr. NOLAN. Yes. Is it not a fact there is no military reason that prevents him from going to France when he enters the Army?

Mr. KAHN. Not only does he go at the age of 18 years, but on the field of France he has died at 18 years of age.

Mr. NOLAN. If the gentleman will yield further. Inasmuch as we have substituted the draft for the volunteer system, why can not we substitute it now at 18 years of age as we did at 21?

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to my colleague that I hope the day of the volunteer system in this country is a thing of the past [applause] and that from now on men will be selected by draft to serve their country and will esteem it an honor and a privilege to serve it.

Mr. NOLAN. Are there any statistics about the number of men under 21 years of age who have volunteered in the Army and Navy?

Mr. KAHN. I have not the figures, but I know there are a great many such boys.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I am sure we all agree with practically all which my colleague has said, but I want to ask him one question, in fairness to the record. I want to ask the gentleman if he believes that it is a matter of necessity, a military necessity, to take the boys of 18 and 19 at this time, or is it a matter of policy of those who advocate it, that it will less disturb industrial and commercial interests of the country? What is the gentleman's judgment as to exhaustion of the man power of this country? Have not we got sufficient men——

Mr. KAHN. I do not think that we at this time, with a due regard to the welfare of the country, can go into the deferred classification, and I take the statement at its full face value made by the Chief of Staff of this country, he being the leader of the military forces in this country, saying that in his opinion it is an absolute necessity at this time.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not the present judgment of the military authorities of our co-belligerents that young men of 18 and 19 years of age have got to be taken in order to win the war?

Mr. KAHN. I imagine they would not be taking them if they did not think so.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman, that being the case, if it is not more sensible for us to follow their present judgment than what their judgment of two or three years ago was?

Mr. KAHN. I will tell the gentleman from New York frankly that I believe that it will bring the war to a very much earlier conclusion and will save hundreds of thousands of young men of 18 years of age who would otherwise have to be called subsequent to the enactment and enforcement of this law.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Is it not a fact that there are many thousands of these babies, or children, as the gentleman from New York calls them, who are now fighting on the firing line in France and doing fine work?

Mr. KAHN. There is no question about it. As my colleague from California pointed out, they have been allowed to go in by volunteering at 18 years of age, and I want to say that in the Navy of the United States volunteering at 18 years of age has been allowed since 1837.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman agree with Gen. March that men of 26 are better soldiers than men of 21? He testified to that before our committee.

Mr. KAHN. He made that statement some months ago.

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I think, if my colleague on the committee will allow me, that if we could get an army of 5,000,000 of 26-years-old men and put them at the western front to beat the Germans it would be the greatest army that the world ever saw, but we can not get them all at 26 years of age. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GORDON. This bill as originally introduced would put into the military service, including those now in, 24,000,000 of men. Is that correct?

Mr. KAHN. I do not remember the exact figures.

Mr. GORDON. Those figures are shown by the report. Now, assuming that is correct, does the gentleman claim we have exhausted our man power and that in order to get four or five millions we have got to go to the boys? [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Of course it is impossible to gauge the value of every individual as a soldier. I have often stated you can take one man who is 30 years of age who will be of no more value as a soldier than a man of 60 years of age, while you can take a man 60 years of age who will be as young as a man 30 years of age. Every individual has got to be classified according to his individual ability and stamina. The defects and the capabilities of the individual must be determined by properly appointed boards, and when those boards make their returns I take it that so far as all practical purposes are served their action ought to be binding upon the Members of this House at any rate.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Considerable has been said here by the gentleman from California with regard to these boys who are 18 years being now in the service. The gentleman from New York said awhile ago that all boys up his way were in the service——

Mr. SNYDER. No; I did not say that, I said practically all of them.

Mr. GOOD. I see in reporting out this bill the statement of the War Department is to the effect that only 10,430 have enlisted during the past nine months who were under 19 at that time, and that there were only 36,540 in all the service under 19 years of age. What is the use of talking about that number in an army of over 3,000,000 of men?

Mr. KAHN. I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech; I yielded for a question, and I will answer it.

The number of enlistments in the Army of the boys of 18 was probably materially cut down after the classification law was agreed upon. They also had the privilege of volunteering in the Navy, and we have over 200,000 young men, as I understand it, now in the reserve of the Navy not doing any actual duty at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. KAHN. I would like to get through.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I know the gentleman wants to be correct. I am reading now from page 8 of the report, on which the statement is made that in the service of the United States, in the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps, there are 36,549 boys under 19 years of age, and that 10,430 of them enlisted since the 1st day of January, 1918.

Mr. FLOOD. They all came from the district of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. SNYDER. Not all, but a good many of them.

Mr. KAHN. As far as I am concerned, I have been informed, without looking up the figures, that there are a great many of the young men who did enlist at 18 years of age both in the Army and in the Navy. And we all know that many of them are now at the front. We know that they were entitled to enlist under the laws of this country. I am told—how true it is I do not know—that even some of the boys who are less than 18 swore that they were 18 in order to get into the service of the country. But I do not suppose that the latter class would make any considerable number.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I notice in section 2 the bill does not include agriculture as one of the industries for which a deferred classification shall be given. Did the committee take into account the effect that taking the 18-year-old boys from the farms would have on the production of food in the United States?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What information did they secure?

Mr. KAHN. It was the opinion of the Provost Marshal General that it would be better to change the law as it is proposed to be changed by the bill rather than to leave the old language stand, because it gave rise to so many controversies. He held that the new language would be a decided improvement because it includes agriculture with every other industry and occupation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But it does state the industries that are essential for the prosecution of the war.

Mr. KAHN. Exactly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And is not agriculture as essential for the prosecution of the war as any other industry?

Mr. KAHN. Agriculture has been construed by the department, as I understand it, as being one of those important industries necessary to the winning of the war.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There are no farm hands left upon the farms aside from the boys below 21 years. After they became 21 years of age they go to the cities and into other occupations, so that nobody will be left if some provision is not made for keeping young men at home on the farms.

Mr. KAHN. I will say to my friend from Kansas that, speaking for myself alone and not voicing the sentiment of any other individual, I do not believe that this country is yet on a sacrificial basis. I do not think we have begun to know in this country the meaning of the words "making sacrifices" as we will know it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But we must raise food to feed our Army and our allies.

Mr. KAHN. Exactly so.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And we will not be able to do that.

Mr. KAHN. I had a letter from England, from an American officer, only three or four weeks ago, in which he said he wished we could see what the English women are doing in England. They are acting as farmers; they are going to the fields; they are going into the workshops. They are doing the work that strong, bearded men have been accustomed to do. They are doing it gladly, uncomplainingly, in order that the English people and the English soldiers may still be fed during these terrible—unutterably terrible—days of trial.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KINKAID. Inasmuch as the Government Employment Agency for the employment of farm labor fell short this year of one-third of the amount of farm labor required, I wish to ask the gentleman from California whether this bill when enacted will allow the War Department more latitude in making provision for necessary farm labor than the present law?

Mr. KAHN. I imagine that the question of feeding the Nation and feeding the armies of this country is one of vital importance, and I feel confident that the various boards charged with the necessity of making the regulations that will supply the people and the armies with food will do their full duty under the law and for the best interests of the people.

But I want to go ahead if I can——

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. He has referred to the part England had played in this war. We expect to raise, as I understand it, 5,000,000 men by the action of this draft. How can we explain the situation when England raised an army of 6,000,000 men, a country with one-half of our population, before she took a boy 18 years of age? Is it not an indictment of the courage of the men of America when, with a population twice that of England, we have to take those boys in order to make up an army of 5,000,000 when England raised an army of 6,000,000 men without taking a single boy?

Mr. KAHN. The war is four years old to England; the war is four years old to France. We propose that the war shall not get older than next year, if we can help it. [Applause.]

And that is the answer to the gentleman from Nebraska. We propose now by this very legislation to furnish the man power to end the horrible struggle that is going on on the other side of the Atlantic, while the gentleman's proposition is to continue it indefinitely.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. I have listened to the gentleman from California, and I know him to be possessed of valuable information. When the gentleman stated that the Chief of Staff said that 4,000,000 men—American soldiers—would break through the German line on the western front at will, did the Chief of Staff say that they necessarily have to be boys? Can not men go through that line?

Mr. KAHN. The Chief of Staff does not propose to take all boys. There are already or there will soon be on that western front 3,000,000 men between 21 and 31 years of age.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. And if it is the decision of this country to settle this war in two years, what is the objection to settling it with the manhood of the Nation?

Mr. KAHN. I am a civilian and not a military authority, as I have said repeatedly on this floor. I can not answer those questions; but I am willing to defer my judgment to that of the men whose duty it is to draw the military plans for this country and let them lead the Nation to victory rather than assent to let any Member of the House lead it to possible defeat and disaster. [Applause.]

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield to my colleague from California.

Mr. NOLAN. Is it not a fact that for the first two years of the war France and England, our allies to-day, depended largely upon this country for their food supplies and munitions, which consequently released a great number of their people to go to the front line of the trenches?

Mr. KAHN. That is very true.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. I regret I can not yield further at present. I can not use all the time allotted to my side. I want to go on a little and later on I will try to yield again.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman yield again?

Mr. KAHN. I am trying to finish this speech. Later on I may be able to do it.

I find that Japan takes her boys from 17 to 40 into her army, and then after that they go into the reserves, to still further defend their country, if need be. Belgium—little Belgium, which has fought so valiantly in this struggle—took her man power from 18 to 40.

But these are present-day conditions. I took occasion to look up world history somewhat to see what had been done by the military powers of the past. I find that in Grecian history, Greek youths became subject to military authority and did fight for and serve their country from 18 to 60. From 18 to 40 Greek warriors were subject to serve anywhere. From 40 to 60 they were subject only to repel invasion. You all know the statement of the Grecian mother who handed her son his shield and spear upon the day he went into the military service. She said to her son, "Come back with your shield, or on it." That was the way and the spirit in which little Greece preserved Caucasian civilization against the hordes of Asia in the early days of recorded history of the human race.

I will not take the time to go into the various nationalities and the various civilizations, all of them more or less warlike, down to our own day, but I wish simply to say this: That in the days of the Republic the famous Roman legions that conquered the known world were made up of men from 17 to 40 years of age. They helped to give the world the largest measure of civilization up to their period that mankind had ever known—these "children," as some Members have chosen in this debate to call 18-year-old soldiers on this floor to-day.

I found that in Ancient Persia in the time of Cambyses the male population was divided into classes designated as children, youths, men, and old men. Each lad of 10 began his military career by entering class 1 and remained therein until he was 20, when he entered the class of youths. There he continued until he was 30 when he went into the men's class. At 40 he was admitted to the class of old men and served therein till he was 55, when he was entirely freed from military duty.

Among the Jews every man over 20 years of age, with certain stated exceptions, was a warrior. At the time of the flight from Egypt each of the 12 tribes furnished a corps of an average of 50,000 men. From this corps, in times of war, the needed number of recruits was selected by lot. It was a draft pure and simple.

In Egyptian history I found that the father of Sesostris, at the time of the latter's birth, selected all the boys born in Egypt on the same day and made of them a military school out of which later grew Sesostris's confidential bodyguard. Many of his generals were among the number of these boys.

And so I could multiply the instances where those civilizations, which thrived and flourished many centuries ago, did not hesitate to employ their youths whenever they embarked upon offensive or defensive warfare.

It has been repeatedly stated upon this floor that if you take the 18-year-old boys into our Army you deprive them of the opportunity of receiving a necessary education. I will ask the Clerk of the House to read in my time a letter from the Director of the Census of this Government.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, August 16, 1918.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KAHN: In compliance with your telephone request of yesterday, I take pleasure in giving below a statement of the percentages which the numbers of males aged 18, 19, and 20 years, respectively, reported at the census of 1910 as having attended any kind of educational institution during the school year 1909–10, formed of the total numbers of males of the same races and ages in the population of the United States:

Age.	Percentage which number of males attending educational institutions represented of total number of males of same race and age in population, 1910.
	All races.	White.	Negro.
18	22.1	22.9	15.3
19	14.8	15.3	9.9
20	9.3	9.7	5.4

The foregoing are the latest authoritative data upon this subject. The report of the commissioner of education for the year ending June 30, 1917, gives (p. 7, vol. 2) a statement showing for the year 1915 the percentage which the estimated number enrolled in schools in each of certain age groups formed of the estimated total number in the same age group. The percentage for the age group 18 to 20, inclusive, for both sexes and all classes of the population was 17.13. In calculating this percentage it was assumed that the age distributions of the population as a whole and of all persons attending school were the same as in 1910.

Very truly, yours,

SAM. L. ROGERS,
Director.

Mr. KAHN. So that, from the testimony of the Director of the Census, only about 2 in 10 of the children of this country who are 18 years of age continue their education.

But I have here the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1917. His tables show, on pages 4 and 5 in volume 2 thereof, that of all pupils and students, male and female, in both private and public schools and colleges in 1915 there were 19,990,316 in elementary schools, or 91.03 per cent of the total; in the secondary schools there were 1,504,972, or 7.13 per cent of the total; in the higher institutions of learning there were only 403,548, or 1.84 per cent of the total.

In closing, I want to say again that on page 8 of that report the Commissioner of Education says:

From the above tables it may be estimated that about 117 in every 1,000 pupils entering the first grade in 1906–7 will graduate from the high school in 1918.

Therefore, about 11.7 per cent of the children, boys and girls, who go to the schools of this country finally graduate from the high schools at 18 years of age.

Now, one word in final conclusion. The gentleman from Kansas during this debate said in effect that the military authorities, under the McKenzie amendment, could call the men 20 years old, and a week or a month later they could call those of the younger ages. If that be the fact—and I assume that he, having voted for it, voted for it on that assumption—where is its improvement over the proposed law submitted by the military authorities, who are given absolute discretion in the matter? They will not call them until they feel that there is necessity to call them under the provision as submitted by them to our committee. I am unwilling with my vote to tie the hands of the military authorities of this country. I am unwilling with my vote to tie the hands of the Commander in Chief of the American Army in this matter. I am willing that he should take the responsibility which the law imposes on him, and therefore I for one shall vote against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE], and will vote for the bill substantially in other respects as reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the purpose of the bill H. R. 12731, under consideration, is to raise the maximum age of the draft to 45 and lower the minimum age to 18. I voted to report the bill out of the committee and shall vote for its passage by the House.

The officials of the War Department who are charged with the prosecution of the war tell us that they must enlarge their plans and have more soldiers than was previously recommended. The authorities who have charge of the administration of the draft law tell us that they must have greater numbers from which to draw if they are to furnish to those in direct charge of the prosecution of the war the forces for which they have asked and which they deem essential to the successful completion of the task before us.

The question as to the number of men needed is strictly a military question which can only be passed upon or decided intelligently by the military men in charge of the prosecution of the war, and when they reach a decision and make a recommendation as to the number of men needed their decision must be respected and their recommendation accepted if we expect to win the war, and we must win it or suffer greater hardships in the future than the prosecution and effects of any war could place upon us, regardless of its magnitude or hardships.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion this is the last great struggle between democracy and autocracy, between free peoples and the rulers of oppressed peoples, between freemen and slaves, so to speak, and that being the case there is but one conclusion that we can reach, which is, that democracy must win and win decisively or submit to autocratic rule and the "iron heel" of oppression throughout the world, and rather than submit to such rule we had better all be dead. But we shall not fail; we shall not bow in humble submission to autocratic rule, but by the strength of our mighty resources, our enormous man power, our skill, our courage, and the justice of our cause, we will win and win gloriously. [Applause.]

I am one of those, however, who believe that hysteria in the prosecution of the war and unnecessary waste in our preparation should be avoided as far as possible, for we know not how long the struggle will continue, and, besides, the Nation must live after it is ended; hence, the necessity of exercising our best judgment and conserving, where to do so will not impede the progress of the war, our resources, our energies, for the burdens of future responsibilities. Please do not understand me to advocate economy to the extent of impairing efficiency or even taking a chance in that direction, for nothing is farther from my thoughts. We must first look to and secure the greatest efficiency that we can produce, but in doing so we should not indulge in wanton or extravagant waste.

By advocating such economy as should be practiced in any or all great enterprises I do not mean to convey the idea that our resources or our man power is becoming depleted, for such is not the case. There is no cause for alarm that either the man power or the military resources of the Nation are about exhausted. The Chief of Staff has stated that that is not the case, as every man well knows that it is not the case.

Now, to the bill in its details and the issues that are involved. The differences between the majority and the minority of the committee are found in a single proposition, and that single proposition is this: Shall the call of the 19 and 18 year classes of registrants be deferred until the older men of class 1 are called, or shall the 19 and 18 year classes be called at the same time, or probably before the older classes are called? That is the only difference that is involved. With regard to the question of placing the immature youth of the Nation in the war we find here and in the country four well-defined opinions on that subject.

There is one class who advocate an infant soldiery, who believe that the boys of 18 and 19 should be called first. There is another class who believe that they should not be called at all. There is another class who believe that they should be called along with the men, and there is still another class who believe that they should be called if necessary, but not until it is necessary. I belong to the class last mentioned. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has said that he advocates throwing our whole strength into this war. So do I. No man on the committee or on the floor of this House believes more firmly in that than I do, or will go further in that direction. The gentleman says he is unwilling to withhold the forces from the military powers of the Nation. I join him in that, and there is nothing in the bill before the House, including the McKenzie amendment, which was adopted by the committee, that withholds one single iota of the force or the man power of the Nation from the executive or military authorities of the Government.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. As a matter of fact, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] is designed to substitute man power for boy power, is it not?

Mr. FIELDS. Absolutely so. Under the bill before the House the Commander in Chief of the Army can call every man between the ages of 18 and 45 within 10 days, or within 1 day if the exigencies of the situation should warrant it, or if he deems it necessary to do so. We need not deceive ourselves on that proposition, because the bill gives him that authority. But here is one proposition, my friends, to which I want to call the attention of the House. You know when the war started last year the plan of the General Staff was to call out the boys first. Its plan at that time was to register the boys from 19 to 25, and to call first the 19 class, then the 20 class, and they stated that in all probability these two classes would supply all the soldiers needed; but Congress said, "This is a man's war, and you shall not place the burdens of fighting it solely upon the immature youths of the Nation." So they were not permitted to call them in the way they had planned. In other words, they were not permitted to call children exclusively, or at all, but were empowered to call men.

Now, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] said, if I remember correctly, that if the exigencies of the situation made it necessary to call the younger men first, of course, then, he would agree to it. Well, we are giving the Provost Marshal General a great deal of latitude. In fact, if we pass this bill without the McKenzie amendment the Provost Marshal General may decide before next week that the exigencies of the situation demands the calling of the 19 or even the 18 year class first. Gentlemen should not become so heated over this proposition. They should deal with it fairly and squarely. If you believe that it is proper to fight this war by putting the boys in front of the men, then vote to strike out the McKenzie amendment. If you believe that the immature youths should not be called unless the exigencies of the situation demand it, and then not until the men of class 1 have been called, you should vote for the McKenzie amendment, for the purpose of the amendment is to prevent the drafting of the 18 and 19 year classes until those above 19 in class 1 have been called. In brief, the McKenzie amendment will prevent the calling of the 18 and 19 year classes first; the bill without the amendment will permit the Provost Marshal General to call the younger classes first if he elects to do so, and judging from his attitude on this proposition in the past I have strong suspicions that he will call the younger classes first if given the authority to do so.

We are all agreed on the main proposition, the prosecution of the war. We all agree that we must prosecute it to the utmost of our ability, but the question as to whether we shall place the burdens of war upon immature youths when it is unnecessary to do so is one of grave concern and should receive the most earnest thought of every man, and if, after calm consideration, you believe in putting the boys in front of men, then vote, as I have previously said, to strike out the McKenzie amendment. If you believe in putting the men in front of the boys, vote for the McKenzie amendment, and then there will be no chance for any speculation or misunderstanding. You will know exactly what you are doing. As I said a moment ago, the man power of the Nation is not exhausted or hardly touched; many men are exempted to-day who owe more to their Government than do boys of 18 and 19. Thousands of men are enjoying the protection of deferred classification who could well be spared to the military service. Every man who has studied the question knows that is true.

We must deal with this proposition sensibly and fairly and in an unbiased and unprejudiced way. We must support the industries essential to the maintenance of the Government. We must have munitions, we must have clothing for our soldiers and our civilian population, and we must have food for all and an ample supply of it for our soldiers especially.

There are, however, many manufacturing interests in the United States that are asking deferred classifications for their men who are not contributing either directly or indirectly to those supplies. Shall we defer the men in those institutions while the boys alone do the fighting or shall the men of the Nation assume their part of the responsibility?

Oh, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] said, "We do not want to disturb industry." But I will say to the gentleman that one of the greatest industries of this country is the production of food, and the boys of 18 and 19 are most valuable on the farm, but they are not given deferred classification as a rule because they are not considered essential to the farm by the men who have written these classifications. Yet the factories of various kinds, and even banking institutions and commercial institutions of one kind and another, have asked for and secured deferred classification for men who ought to be on the battle line to-day. There is a great, united effort in this country, and has been from the time this war started, to put the boys of the country into the front ranks.

One of the publicity agents of these organizations went so far last winter as to say editorially—and I give him credit for frankness—that "there are boys enough of the 18, 19, and 20 year classes to supply all the soldiers that we need or can maintain on the western battle front, and by drafting those classes into the service we can release the men to the industries." I am opposed to such warfare as that. If such a plan was carried out it would, of course, increase the man power of the factories, enlarge their output, and enable them to wax still richer on war profits; but I am opposed to drafting the boys for the purpose of enabling some men to get rich. Now, if it becomes necessary for the boys of 18 or even younger to go we will all make the sacrifice, regardless of how painful it may be; but by the eternals, I am unwilling to subject the boys of 18 or 19 to the burdens of war while men are being deferred for industries which are not essential to the war.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to digress from the main thought at this point to say for the information of any who might seek to ascribe to me selfish motives because of my opposition to the drafting of the boys of the 18 and 19 year classes until it becomes necessary to do so, that I have no personal interest in the matter. I have no son or no relative between the ages of 18 and 20 or who is nearing the age of 18 who would be protected by the McKenzie amendment. My two oldest sons, who are 24 and 22, respectively, are both in the military service, having long since volunteered. My third son has passed his twentieth birthday, is almost 21, and is, therefore, above the age to which the McKenzie amendment applies, and I will say in passing that he has asked my permission to volunteer as soon as he completes his course in school, which will be within the next few days, and I have consented for him to do so. My fourth son is only 14, and we all hope that the war will end within less than four years. I therefore have no personal interest whatever in the matter. My only interest in it is my interest in humanity, my interest in the weak as against the strong, in the right as against the wrong.

So let us accept the right and protect the weak by passing this bill with the McKenzie amendment, which makes it impossible to put the boys in front of the men, or to be more explicit, it will prevent the calling of boys until they are actually needed. That is all there is to it. It does not make it impossible for the War Department to call the boys, and it does not defer their call one single day when they are needed, but it does make it impossible to call them before the men in class 1 are called.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] repeatedly objected to boys 18 years of age being called children. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if it is not a fact that they are children simply because the law of our land so designates them?

Mr. FIELDS. The law of the land designates them as children simply because they are children.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The law calls them infants.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If these boys are children, why does our Government allow them to enlist? And there are thousands of them over there fighting to-day.

Mr. FIELDS. That is true; and I will say to the gentleman that I was not in favor of that. I have advocated the most vigorous prosecution of the war of which we are capable, but I have believed, and now believe, that we could prosecute it more vigorously with an army of men than with an army of undeveloped boys. By that statement I cast no reflection upon the brave and patriotic lads who have volunteered. They are doing splendidly; but if they were fully developed they would do better and be more able to endure the strain to which they are subjected.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. TILSON. I know the gentleman wishes to be fair, because he is one of the fairest men on the committee. He says the object of the amendment is to prevent the sending of boys ahead of the men. Now, suppose we assume that the President and his advisers are all bad and want to do the worst thing they can, can not they call out the men to-day and the boys to-morrow—as the gentleman says, get them all into camp and then send the boys to France and leave the men in the camp. Could not they do that?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes; but does the gentleman think they would do that? Of course he does not.

Mr. TILSON. How does the amendment prevent their doing that very thing?

Mr. FIELDS. The amendment would not prevent such action, and does not need to, for the honor and decency of the President and the Provost Marshal General is a guaranty against it. I am not assuming that the President and the Provost Marshal General are bad and the gentleman knows it, and I cast no reflection upon them. The gentleman knows that I have supported the War Department and the President as strongly as any other man on the committee.

But, I said, to use the language of the gentleman from California, suppose that in the mind of the Provost Marshal General some condition should arise which in his opinion justified the calling of the boys first, the bill without the McKenzie amendment would permit him to do it and with the McKenzie amendment it would not, and I will say in this connection that I see no reason for hanging the whole question as to whether the boys shall go first or last upon the discretion of the Provost Marshal General, who we know has always favored the drafting of the boys first. In his natural frame of mind it would be extremely easy for him to decide that the boys should go first, for you know it is easy for a man to believe that which he wants to believe.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In regard to the McKenzie amendment, did the gentleman hear the question asked by the gentleman from Minnesota as to the effect of the last provision in the McKenzie amendment—

> All registrants of the age of 20 years and above on the day fixed by the President for registration shall be called prior to those in the classes hereby created—

The contention was that the 18 and 19 year old boys should not be called until all the classification of the past draft had been exhausted?

Mr. FIELDS. It means that until class 1 shall have been exhausted. I am frank to say that I think class 2 should be materially invaded. I think that too many have been placed in class 2 in certain sections because of their connection with industry. We hardly know what class 2 means in the agricultural or rural sections. We have no class 2 men of any consequence.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I agree with the gentleman. If an amendment should be offered to the bill on page 2 changing the figures "18" to "20" the draft would apply to men between 20 and 45, and the McKenzie amendment with its possibilities of creating this confusion would be eliminated from the bill.

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Leaving the people of the United States to thoroughly understand the draft provision and know that the eligibles would be from 20 to 45.

Mr. FIELDS. The adoption of such an amendment would eliminate the McKenzie amendment by excluding from the draft the classes to which it applies.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Can not every man be taken under the McKenzie amendment within, say, a week if it became necessary?

Mr. FIELDS. Absolutely so.

Mr. RAKER. By deferring the classification of 18 and 19, can there be any reason given why it would retard the War Department in any way if the McKenzie amendment was written into the law requiring the older men to be taken first?

Mr. FIELDS. A statement could not be correctly made that it would impede the progress of the War Department or weaken the man power of the Military Establishment, because every man knows, as the Chief of Staff testified before the committee, that men are better for the service than the boys. He stated specifically that men of 26 are even better than men of 21.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. The McKenzie amendment contains no limitation on the authority of the War Department to utilize the man power between 18 years and 45 years.

Mr. FIELDS. None whatever.

Mr. REAVIS. They could take them as well with the McKenzie amendment in as without it; that is, they are authorized by the McKenzie amendment in this bill to take the man power between those ages just as completely as they would be if the McKenzie amendment was not in it.

Mr. FIELDS. They could call every man from 20 years and up to-day and the balance of them to-morrow.

Mr. REAVIS. There is no limitation in the McKenzie amendment on the utilization of the man power between 18 years and 45 years.

Mr. FIELDS. There is none.

Mr. REAVIS. The practical operation of that amendment would be if the demands of the country and the department could be satisfied by the utilization of those between 20 and 45 before using the 18, the boys would remain at home.

Mr. FIELDS. That is correct.

Mr. REAVIS. If the demands are not so satisfied, the country can utilize them below the age of 20.

Mr. FIELDS. Yes; and to state it another way, if we are not to utilize all the man power at once, under the McKenzie amendment we will utilize the older men first and keep the young men at home; but if necessary to use all at once they can all be called.

Mr. REAVIS. The McKenzie amendment places no limit on that.

Mr. FIELDS. No.

Mr. FOCHT. I would like to ask the gentleman's judgment on this one question.

Of the 3,000,000 that are proposed to be taken from the grammar schools and the high schools of the country, has the gentleman any information as to how many of that number could be made up out of the foreigners who are here living in our midst and out of the slackers who are in our midst instead of taking these boys of tender age? Does the gentleman know how many might be taken from that class that it is admitted are here, and why should they not be taken before the boys?

Mr. FIELDS. I have not the figures at hand.

Mr. FOCHT. Does the gentleman think there would be enough or half enough.

Mr. FIELDS. I would not want to express an opinion on that because I do not like to express an opinion without information.

Mr. FOCHT. Then the gentleman has not the information.

Mr. FIELDS. No. I have not. I have read the data in a general way, but I do not recall the numbers given.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the question just asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT], admitting that there are a number of foreigners and slackers, does not the gentleman believe they should be taken before we go into the boy class?

Mr. FIELDS. I think that the slackers should be taken, also the foreigners who are living here, so far as would not conflict with our treaties. We of course can not afford to violate treaty agreements, for to do so might involve us with friendly nations.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] referred to the fact that Germany to-day occupies a portion of the territory of Belgium and France and other European countries. That is true, but when Germany invaded those countries she did not invade them with her boys in the front ranks. She invaded them with her men, for, as has already been shown, she had not sent her boys to the front. Therefore, his reference to that fact does not strengthen his argument that the McKenzie amendment should be eliminated from this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I want to refer, as the chairman of the committee has, to some criticism that has come from certain quarters of the country of the House and the Military Affairs Committee because this bill was not passed at an earlier date. The Committee on Military Affairs has given the War Department to understand from the time that the war began that it was ready at all times to act in the most expeditious manner upon any measure that the department cared to put before it. When the committee met after this session of the Congress convened we asked the War Department to let us know what they wanted and stated that we would give it to them in both matériel and men. The chairman of the committee suggested the raising of an army of 4,000,000 men. That was not approved by the department. We said to them, "We want to give you every dollar and every man that is necessary." When the appropriation bill was before the Senate committee less than 60 or 90 days ago, the Senate committee was considering the advisability of adding an amendment which, in effect and almost in words, was identical with this bill, and the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War appeared before the Senate committee and stated that it was not their wish to have it done at that time, that it was not necessary. Then Congress prepared to take a brief recess, and did recess.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state what date it was that they appeared before the committee?

Mr. FIELDS. It was during the consideration of the appropriation bill; I do not remember the exact date, but it was only a short time ago.

Mr. RAKER. Some time in July.

Mr. FIELDS. Yes; or late in June, perhaps. And then Congress had not more than recessed until this proposition was given out to the press of the country, and certain elements in the country who like to resort to the lash-and-spur method began, through certain papers of the country, to criticize the Congress, and especially the Committee on Military Affairs, for delay in the proposition. Yet no new developments have presented themselves here or elsewhere that demanded more speedy action than the committee had heretofore offered to take. Those criticisms are unfair and unjust and have been used over the country for a purpose which is so manifest that it need not be explained to be understood.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I find from this report that the letter from the Provost Marshal General upon the subject of changing the draft age was not written until July 27, 1918. I would ask the gentleman whether the subject of the amendment of this law was presented in any way, shape, or form to the Military Affairs Committee or any of the Members that he knows of before the Congress commenced to take the three-day recesses about the 18th of July?

Mr. FIELDS. I had no knowledge of it until I read of it in the newspapers, after I had gone to my home in Kentucky to spend the recess, or a portion of it, and it is my understanding that no member of the committee had knowledge of it. Now, in conclusion I wish to say that I have stated the proposition as clearly as I am capable of stating it. All there is to the McKenzie amendment is that the boys of the Nation can not be put in front. I judge that every man will exercise the dictates of his own conscience upon the question. Either way it goes, it does not go to impede the progress of the War Department or affect the prosecution of the war, and I think that no man on this floor would vote for or entertain the thought of voting for a proposition that would in any way impede the progress of the War Department or weaken its hand in the prosecution of the war. It is every man's duty to stand behind the policies of the War Department. We may differ upon matters of detail. We have the right to express our opinions upon matters of detail. The trouble with some men is that they fail to distinguish between a policy and a detail incident thereto. The question as to whether we shall draft the boys before the men, along with the men, or after the men is not a question of policy, it is a question of detail.

Our policy is to raise all the man power that is necessary to prosecute this war, but the question as to what or which class shall be called first is only a detail and does not affect the policy, and I will say in this connection that while every Member of the Congress and every citizen has expressed his opinion on matters of detail it is gratifying to see how unanimously both the Congress and the country have supported the war policy in its entirety.

If I may refer briefly to my own course, without violating the rules of propriety, I can say that I have supported the entire war policy to the utmost of my strength and ability.

I spoke in support of the war resolution when it was under discussion in the House, but was called to the bedside of my wife, who was dangerously ill, before the vote was taken, and for that reason was prevented from voting for it. I have advocated from the beginning the raising of the largest and most efficient army of which we are capable and by the most expeditious methods at our command. I have voted for the appropriation of every dollar asked for by the War Department for the support of the Army and the prosecution of the war. I was one of the first members of the committee to advocate giving to the President unlimited power in the exercise of the draft, which power was conferred by a provision carried in the last appropriation bill.

The Secretary of War has asked the Congress for many amendments to the original law of 1917, and I have supported each amendment for which he has asked and had charge of their most important amendment (the new quota bill) on the floor of the House, and I trust that I may not be classed as immodest if I say that the Secretary of War gave expression to his appreciation of my support of the department by a letter which he wrote to me on June 1, which reads as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, June 1, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM J. FIELDS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FIELDS: I have just read the record of the debate on the Army bill, and am so grateful for the splendid support which the committee is giving the department that I want to express my personal thanks to you for your part in it.

Cordially, yours,

(Signed) NEWTON D. BAKER.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Some one made the statement that the placing of these older men would require 100 days for classification. I did not get it plainly, but it seems to intimate that the adoption of this amendment would consume a good deal of time in classifying the older men. What about that?

Mr. FIELDS. Well, I might claim that the gentleman's hair is red, but that would not make it red.

Mr. HARDY. Is there any way by which this amendment would delay the enlisting of the number of men desired?

Mr. FIELDS. There is not, but if there was, why did they come in so late? As I have just stated, this bill was about to be added as a Senate amendment to the Army appropriation bill late in June, and the War Department requested the committee not to include it in the bill.

Mr. HARDY. The question is, Is it true?

Mr. FIELDS. It is true. The House Committee on Military Affairs wanted to raise an Army of 4,000,000 men when we considered the appropriation bill. The Senate committee inserted this amendment into the appropriation bill, and the War Department opposed both propositions; so if there is delay in the calling of these men the War Department, and not the Congress, is responsible for the delay. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

TEMPORARY INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, of course the important thing with which we have to deal is to provide the means by which the war can be won. If we are going to fight the war vigorously we will have to provide the means. If those who are responsible for the conduct of the war, namely, the President and the Secretary of War and the heads of the Military Establishment, indicate there is only one way by which we can be assured of certain early successes then I think we are derelict in the performance of our duty if we do not comply with their demands. It is infinitely more important that we should win the war and win it soon than it is that we should quibble about who should go to fight the battles.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I refuse to yield. Every family in the United States has already been invaded, and I apprehend that every family will be still further invaded on account of the obligations that have arisen from the war. Personally I believe in universal military training, and the putting of the 18-year-old man into this class of drafted men will enable the President and the Secretary of War to give them the training which they ought to have and need before they are called into active service. The time has come when we ought not to have any division of sentiment about what should be done. The longer we take to win the war the more of our men will die, the more difficulties will surround our industrial, agricultural, and economic situation here. It is a very serious proposition we have to deal with. Nobody regrets more than I do that we are called upon to act on this occasion; but we are in the war—we can not get away from it—and the American people expect to win it, and they are willing to stand behind the Government of the United States in any way that is necessary to win it. If we are going to maintain American liberty and perpetuate American institutions we have got to make every sacrifice that is necessary to make. It is infinitely better for us to sacrifice among ourselves voluntarily than it is to wait until success crowns the German arms and they are permitted to invade American shores and impose burdens upon us against our will.

It is far better for us to be willing to meet the situation, and meet it cheerfully and meet it immediately and to meet it in a way in which it can be met, and the only way in which it can be met is by raising an Army sufficiently large and equipping that Army with everything it needs, than it is to wait and putter along and continue to be uncertain about the outcome. There has been a great deal of fault found about the delay in making preparation for war. If we had been prepared a year before the war began the war would have been over before now; but it seemed to be difficult to make those in responsible control of the Government to understand the need and importance of early vigorous action. But the momentum has begun. We have already organized a great force, both in the Army and the Navy. We are already beginning to see the equipment move forward with which to supply the men on the battle front, and while they are there we who are behind the lines owe them an obligation, and that is to stand behind them with every facility that it is possible to supply. Now, if one of those facilities is additonal man power, then that must be supplied. We must all dedicate ourselves to the country, to its future, to its freedom. We must give everything we have if need be, even to our lives; and I have no fear that without restriction the military authorities will take these 18-year-old boys and put them at the front without proper training. My thought is that they will be taken by the military authorities and they will be given at least eight months' military training in American camps. That is equivalent to sending them to school, and it will be giving them an education which they need and ought to have. Every boy in America should be given such training. I am as much opposed to war as any man, but I love America and I love the freedom which it affords, and I am willing to make every and all sacrifices that we may maintain that freedom and hand it down to the children of our children, so that they, too, may glorify liberty and patriotism. We do not want to live in a country less free than the country our forefathers lived in, and neither do we want our children to do so. We do not want to live under the iron heel of oppression of the German Government, and there is only one way, in my judgment, to prevent it, and that is for America, in company with the allied nations with whom it is associated, to win this war; and to win the war means that we must raise an Army the weight of which will be greater than the army against which it has to go. Germany makes no hesitation about the method that it pursues, and we must meet Germany on its own ground with instruments and methods equal to its own, and superior, if we expect to win. Win we must. No one wants to take the children of America and put them on the battle field. Every American, however, believes that there can be no question about our duty and our obligation. Our duty and our obligation compel us, regardless of whether we will or not, to do whatever is necessary to be done; and if those who are charged with the responsibility of executing the law, charged with the responsibility of commanding the men, say that there is no other way to insure success than the way in which they have indicated, then our duty is clear. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I base my objection to the drafting of men under age on the ground of responsibility and rights of citizenship. It does not matter whether a ward of the State is in school or out of it. I believe that with the privileges of citizenship should go the responsibilities and obligations of military service, and, incidentally, that is one of the reasons why I am against woman suffrage. [Applause.] I think anyone who is given the privilege of citizenship should be compelled to give his life to defend the country, but not until then. I am going to vote for the McKenzie amendment. I am in favor of universal military training of our boys from 18 to 21 for the reason I have given. I am opposed to universal military service for our boys from 18 to 21.

If the men of the United States can not defend the United States, then they should turn the United States over to the women and the children. [Applause.]

We started out to make this a man's war, and I think that one of the chief reasons why we are getting such reports from the Army on the other side is that we have a man's army. We might have had different reports if more than half of that army had been 17 and 18 year old boys. When men become citizens they know why they are there, and they know what to do. And the military authorities, I think, have been just as much surprised at the speed with which our men—not our boys—are moving toward Berlin as some of the enemy themselves. But do not forget that that is an army of men, and it is the first men's army that the world has seen in action.

Now, the McKenzie amendment does a very specific thing. It prevents putting the immature men into the service. We men here know that there may be 250,000 or 300,000 boys of 18 or 19 years of age now in service. That is all well and good; but those boys are boys who are practically mature now. But if you take by one fell swoop the 18-year-old boys of this country you do not get that quality. I have a lad who is 17½ years old now. He will be in the service long before he is 21. He is getting all the military training that I can give him, and has had for five years. He has been in command of a machine-gun squad for four months, and is an expert with the gun, and he is not looking for any swivel-chair place. But that boy is exceptionally well developed physically. He has had a special training in military service, and in a year from now will be sufficiently mature to go in and do his part. But that boy is one out of a thousand so far as his opportunities are concerned, and he can take care of himself. If you want to keep the American Army up to the quality it now has, you do not want to make it 50 per cent juvenile.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I have been informed that there are between 60,000 and 70,000 boys in the Army now that are between 18 and 21.

Mr. MEEKER. Out of 3,000,000 men.

Mr. GARNER. I know that it is not less than 200,000, and I think it is nearer 500,000 than it is 60,000.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman know the division that turned the Prussian Guard to flight last July on the western front?

Mr. MEEKER. No.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will tell the gentleman that it was the Second Division of Marines, and a great part of them were no more than 18 or 19 years old. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. In the report of the committee the statement is made by the War Department that on January 1 there were 36,549 boys under 19 years of age in the Navy and Marine Corps and Army of the United States.

Mr. MEEKER. The statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], everybody knows, could not be true.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I said from 18 to 21. You said from 18 to 19.

Mr. MEEKER. We are now talking about efficiency; and let us not forget, in our sudden fervor here for training these boys—and I am for universal training, and have been—that if it had not been for some military authorities that have been quoted we would have had it a year ago. I do not know why we should suddenly quote somebody who is a year behind on military training.

As to military training, yes; but as to putting these boys, from the standpoint of efficiency as well as from the standpoint of justice, into this service, I think the McKenzie amendment is fair. Of course, we are now in the midst of war. I am not going to confess to the enemy that when we have put 3,000,000 men in uniform our man power is exhausted in this country. [Applause.]

The kind of talk is tommy rot to say that out of 25,000,000 men we throw up the flag of distress inside of 18 months. The man power of the United States has not yet begun to be realized. I think our greatest problem now is not in getting more men over there. It is in sending the fellows that are there now the stuff with which to do the job. [Applause.] If they have the munitions and the equipment, they can take care of that army. We know that it is production in this country and not man power on the field. We have not yet begun to organize. The turnover of labor in this country is more appalling than the shortages of men on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, while I have listened to this discussion a good many random thoughts have been running through my brain. I have heard a number of most remarkable arguments submitted, and I have wondered whether or not this is really the American Congress. One gentleman, and a very eminent gentleman, a Member of this House, says that he is willing to waive his judgment on all these questions in favor of that of the military authorities of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to do that on a question which involves purely and strictly military knowledge, but when it comes to determining the simple, naked question of whether or not the men of the United States should fight the battles of this country or whether the boys should do it, I respectfully decline to allow any military man to settle the question for me as a Representatve in the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

It has also been intimated here that we ought to accept what comes from the War Department in this time of war without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," because they know and we do not. I decline to subscribe to that doctrine. I am not willing as a Member of Congress, representing my constituency, to abdicate my functions, in time of peace or in time of war, to a lot of swivel-chair soldiers in the War Department.

Now, somebody may say, "Because you oppose anything these gentlemen do"—and that is said in the newspapers and elsewhere—"you are unpatriotic." And Members of this House have even been almost accused of treason because they have seen fit to assert their own judgment and not swallow, like a young mocking bird swallows the worm, everything that these gentlemen are of a mind to poke into their throats. I had thought that we had three departments to this Government, coordinate departments, of equal integrity, having their different functions to perform, but it seems that we have not.

It seems that in time of war we should abdicate and allow the military to do the legislating. We have jubilated in the public press only recently over the fact that our troops have captured German boys 18 years of age, and we have declared to the world that this is evidence that the man power of Germany is exhausted and that they have got to put the children in their army. And yet here we are, in the very beginning of war, so far as we are concerned, undertaking to say that the 18, the 19, and the 20 year old boy, who has never had a voice in Government, shall be called, and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] indignantly denies that they are children. He denies it, but the laws of his country and the Constitution which he has sworn to uphold and defend declare that they are children. They can not make a contract. They can not perform any of the functions of a man under the law. And yet we propose to drag them, nolens volens, into the vortex of this awful struggle.

So far as I am concerned, I shall never consent. I said in my recent race for renomination in my district—and the people applauded it everywhere—that I would never vote in this House to draft a boy under 21 years of age into the Army of the United States until I was convinced that the man power of the United States had been depleted to that extent that made it necessary, and that when that time came I would vote to take them from the ages of 15 to 70, if it was necessary in order to win this war. [Applause.] And yet any of us who take a position like that are liable to be called "traitors" or stigmatized as "treasonable." Let me tell you: I have two sons only, one within the recent draft age, now out upon the mighty ocean somewhere under the flag of his country. I have only one nephew in all the world, an only sister's only son, and he is in the trenches in France. [Applause.] I have another son, too old for the original draft, with a wife and two babies to support; but if the time comes for him to go—and he is now anxious to get into it—I shall give him the Godspeed of a father and say, "Go!" But I shall not vote to send your 18 or 19 year old boy there, and I have none to be affected by this legislation.

Let us stop and think for a moment. These boys, as I intimated a moment ago, have never had any voice in the government of this land. They are children; the law declares they are children and they are immature. But they say, "We are going to give them an education." The gentleman from Illinois who spoke a moment or two ago said, "We are going to give them an education." Yet the hearings show that the Chief of Staff stated that he expected the last one of them to be in France by June 30 of next year. How much of an education will they get in that time? How much will they be educated? If you can completely educate a boy within that time, then we ought to abolish West Point and we ought to abolish Annapolis, and we ought to set up new institutions according to this newly developed idea, where you can give them complete educations within six or eight months instead of in four years.

Mr. Chairman, what will Germany say if we pass this bill at this time? What will the world say? What will everybody say? America, the greatest republic that ever existed beneath the dome of high heaven, the greatest government that was ever upon the earth, with her 25,000,000 men, with her illimitable resources, right at the threshold of the struggle has come to the pitiful necessity of going to the cradle to get her soldiers to fight her battles. [Applause.]

I yield back the rest of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida yields back two minutes.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has consumed 1 hour and 45 minutes, and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has consumed 1 hour and 28 minutes.

Mr. DENT. I will ask the gentleman from California to consume some more of his time.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we all have in the House of Representatives a common desire, a supreme determination, and, although we may differ in a matter of opinion, we all aim to do and to accomplish the same great thing, to whip the Germans. We differ only as to methods.

Now, the most awful and stupendous crisis that has ever confronted our race now confronts us. Everything that freemen hold dear and sacred is immediately and dangerously at stake. If Germany wins, absolutism and imperialism win, and probably for all time; and if America and the allies win, freedom wins, and the Declaration of Independence will be the chart of the nations for all time.

Now, there is no question about whipping Germany. Germany must be whipped if it takes 20 years to do it, and we want to whip her in 20 months or 20 days if possible. We have declared war against the Imperial German Government and likewise against the Imperial Austrian Government. We have a registered man power of 10,000,000 of men. We have a possible man power of over 23,000,000 of men. We have a conservatively estimated national wealth of something like $250,000,000,000; and before I, as a Representative from New York—an American Representative—will consent that the flag of our Republic shall be hauled down in dishonor and disgrace, and before I will consent that the brave boys that we are sending to the trenches of Europe shall be ordered back in humiliation and in shame, I will vote to send every man of the 23,000,000 to the field and cast every dollar of the $250,000,000,000 into the scales. [Applause.]

But, as was suggested by the distinguished representative from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER], I want this war, so far as America is concerned, to be known as a man's war and not as a child's war. I am perfectly willing that boys of 18 or 17 or 16 should defend their country and take the field if the supreme necessities of the occasion demand.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EMERSON. Who is to determine when that necessity arises?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. As far as the action of this Congress on this bill is concerned this Congress is to determine that and not the General Staff. [Applause.] I might answer the gentleman's question by asking one. Does not the gentleman understand that under the Constitution it is our privilege and duty to do that, without allowing the General Staff to do anything except to act in an advisory capacity? [Applause.]

Now, the whole question, it seems to me, is a question of figures, of what people have done in this war and what we can do, not in imitation of them but as a matter of experience based on what they have done. Let us see. As I get it from the Military Affairs Committee, doubtless correct, the total man power of this Republic between 18 and 45 years is 23,086,500. The man power between 18 and 19 is approximately 2,000,000. Subtract 2,000,000 from 23,000,000 and we have 21,000,000 left. We have already called an army of approximately 2,000,000. If you subtract the present army from the man power left after the 2,000,000 boys have been subtracted, you have manhood yet to be combed out, to be utilized, of 19,000,000 men with which to raise approximately an army of 2,500,000. And if we can not raise 2,500,000 from the 19,000,000 men, the question arises, Why can we not do it? Is it because of the poor quality of the manhood, or is it because of the miserably poor legislation that we propose to enact in this Chamber?

What have other nations done? France, with about 38,000,000 or 39,000,000 people, has raised an army of over 6,000,000 men without calling upon the 18-year-old boys of that country. Have they a superior manhood? I deny that it is superior to ours. The British Isles, with approximately 45,000,000 people, have raised over 6,000,000 men. Is British manhood superior to American manhood? They did this before they called upon the 18-year-old boys.

My distinguished friend from California [Mr. KAHN], for whom I have the greatest respect and an almost inordinate admiration, stated that Germany, France, and England in sending the boys last made a huge military mistake. I submit that my friend, who is generally unanswerable in argument and powerful and logical in his statements and deductions, begged the question because he had a poor case. I will tell you why those countries did it. France is chivalrous, beautiful, brilliant, sentimental, poetic, humane, and at the bar of history France refused to have it said that she sent boys onto the battle field before men were sent. [Applause.] And she sent them only after the men had been exhausted and she was, so to speak, bled white. So with England. And is it to be stated by the historian of the future, when this gigantic struggle is discussed, that France was so humane and sentimental, that England was so humane and sentimental, and that even Germany—atrocious Germany—was so sentimental that they refused to employ the boy power before the man power was exhausted, and that we had not done the same? My friends, I regretted to hear the gentleman say, and he could not have said it in measured terms and after reflection, that we were practical and proposed to dispense with sentiment in this war. I deny that we can do that without ourselves abrogating the great purposes for which we have entered the struggle. [Applause.] Sentiment is at once the cornerstone and the gilded dome of civilization. Destroy sentiment and civilization will fall. It was the failure to be sentimental and humane that carried Germany into Belgium, that destroyed Gothic cathedrals builded in the time of the Norman conquest, that raped women, that murdered children, that described treaties as scraps of paper. It was lack of sentiment that did these things. I refuse to subscribe to the statement that we are to cease to be sentimental. Let us win this war—we will win it; we are bound to win it; God has decreed that we shall win it; justice demands that we shall win it—but let us win it with bearded men and not with beardless boys. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York yields back two minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that my friend and colleague from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] made the speech that he has just concluded, and I hope he will have the good sense to tear it up and vote right on this proposition. The State of New York in this House, at least the Republicans from that State, and, I think, also the Democrats—I do not like to inject politics into this debate—will vote pretty solidly against this amendment, in my opinion. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to say it, but this proposed amendment to the bill extending the draft ages, limiting the power of the President to call the younger men, is supported chiefly by Members of this House who voted against the war and who voted against the original draft act, and it is the last gasp of the obstructors of the war. They are the men, at least, who are most volubly supporting this amendment. I should think that fact alone ought to be enough to make every man who is heart and soul for the war and for winning it as speedily as possible vote against it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I should like to say——

Mr. PLATT. I admit I was a little severe in that statement——

Mr. McKENZIE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it. I do not propose that the gentleman shall question my sincerity in this war.

Mr. PLATT. I do not. The gentleman from Illinois is as patriotic as any man here. I simply deplore the fact that the gentleman is in very bad company. I am sorry for it. The gentleman's amendment was drawn in good faith, and there is undoubtedly a considerable sentiment for it.

Mr. McKENZIE. And I deny the right of the gentleman to speak for his colleagues from New York. New York does not send that kind of men.

Mr. PLATT. The Representatives from New York will speak for themselves, and their words and votes will show whether I am right.

Mr. MEEKER. Does the gentleman know any man who fought harder for the draft than the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. PLATT. I know the gentleman from Missouri supported the draft very ably, but I do not know how the gentleman is going to vote on this amendment.

Mr. MEEKER. I am going to vote for this amendment; therefore it ill becomes the gentleman to gauge his standard of patriotism in that way.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman should not be in the company that he is in; that is all I have got to say to him. I do not question his sincerity or his motives.

Now, what is the use of this sentimentalism? Go and ask any veteran of the Civil War, on the Confederate side or the Union side, and you will find they will tell you that the Civil War was fought by men under 21, the majority of them. I talked with a leading veteran up in my district the other day, and told him that there was a strong sentiment here in some quarters against the drafting of the younger men. He said, "That is all nonsense. I enlisted when I was 15. I was not 20 when I came home a lieutenant." He is a man well over 70 years old now, hale and hearty, and serving his country well as chairman of the draft board of his town. I do not believe boys of 15 ought to be allowed to enlist, but we have allowed boys of 16 to enlist in the Navy until very recently, with the consent of their parents. We consider men of 18 of age for the purpose of enlistment. They can and do enlist without consent of their parents. We allow the recruiting sergeants to go through the country and advertise in the newspapers for volunteers and try to get them away from their parents, because the law allows them to enlist without the consent of their parents. Why be sentimental? If they are old enough and mature enough for the Government to contract with them for enlistment they are old enough to be drafted if the country needs them—and most of them want to go.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. In the case of the Civil War was it not because of dire necessity both in the North and in the South?

Mr. PLATT. I think not. It was voluntary enlistment. Eighteen has for many years been in our military laws as the minimum Army and militia enlistment age.

Mr. GORDON. In the North they confined the draft to 20 years of age. They never drafted a man under 20.

Mr. PLATT. I am not talking about the draft, but the voluntary enlistment question. That was worse in the Civil War than any draft that ever existed, for every boy of 18 was made to feel that he was a slacker and a coward if he did not go in. The draft is infinitely better than to allow the recruiting officers to go around the country and take boys away from their parents without their consent and put them in the Army. We can not fight the war on sentiment; we have to take men where they can be got. We all know that if you try to take men from 32 to 45 you will not get very many. The younger men leave mothers, from whom none of us like to take them, but the older men leave mothers and wives and children.

The purpose of this bill is to raise an army. In my opinion we made a mistake in the first place that we did not take the ages that were given us in the original draft act drawn by the War Department of men between 19 and 25. I recall that there was an amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] to the bill as reported from the committee to restore the age limits recommended, and how many Members of this House voted for it?

Mr. GORDON. Six.

Mr. PLATT. My recollection is that only three voted for it, but it may be that there were six. One was the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Gardner, who has since lost his life in the war; another was the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]; and I was the other. If there were six, I do not recall who the others were. It was a committee division and not a roll call. We made a mistake, in my opinion, in not accepting the provision that they gave us then and let the War Department take the responsibility, for we could extend the ages later as needed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And the ages of 19 to 25 would have produced an entire army.

Mr. PLATT. Nearly as many as we have got now, judging from the figures given in the report accompanying this bill. We could have taken them without having any considerable number of deferred classifications. In the other countries they have no deferred classification, and they take the married men, too. We can do that, if necessary, but I hope it will not be necessary. Every consideration for raising a large army and raising it quickly is in favor of drafting the younger men, who generally have no dependents and are often not yet settled at work. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, it will be conceded on all hands that we ought not to hesitate to take the necessary steps to insure victory and to reach this result at the earliest possible moment. The necessary steps may be painful, but defeat by the Hun is a contingency so fearful that, whatever sacrifice the American people are called on to make, I feel sure that there is no division of sentiment about making the sacrifice.

I believe it will also be conceded that in a war of this magnitude not only must armies be placed in the field but every resource of the Nation must be energized and coordinated.

To this end we have enacted laws placing in the hands of the President the most extraordinary powers over the great industries and properties of the country and the welfare and lives of its people. He has used those powers with wisdom and prudence, and to-day the President of this country stands preeminent over all the great men of the civilized world.

The best brains of the business world in every line are now at work, each in his own line, to produce great results.

The War Department has been administered by the able Secretary with the greatest success and ability. The results speak for themselves. Out of a helpless condition the country, in record-breaking time, has been placed upon an efficient war footing.

A great army of over 3,000,000 men has been armed, equipped, and marshaled for the work in hand.

By the utilization of the great resources of the people of this country an army of nearly a million and a half of men has been landed in France with the necessary means and supplies to maintain it.

Since the participation of the American forces in the great battles the Huns have been driven from the portals of Paris and have ceased to be a menace to the channel ports. It has about ceased to be a question how far the Hun can carry his offensive, and the question now facing the forces of civilization is how to overcome his resistance.

At this juncture the President comes before Congress with a measure designed by the military leaders to enable him to deliver speedily the final blow.

The plan now contemplates an army of 5,000,000 men, 4,000,000 of whom, by the 1st of next July, will be in France, with a reserve army in this country of 1,000,000. This means an increase of 2,300,000 to our present forces.

Of course, such an enlarged military scheme is a greater tax upon the resources of the country than it has yet been called upon to carry. It requires now, more than at any time heretofore, men in the army of production. We must seek for our Army its necessary man power out of those who have not yet been synchronated with its necessary production.

This, we are told by the President and all those in charge of our military operations, can only be done by enlarging the age limits.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. Has the War Department taken a square position on this McKenzie amendment?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. The War Department has said that it had no objection if it was left clearly and substantially as it was in the original bill; that is, that 18-year-old men can be put in one class and not be called until the others are exhausted, if practicable. That is what the bill authorizes the President to do.

Mr. EMERSON. Has the President given his view upon it?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. The Secretary of War and the Provost Marshal General and the Chief of Staff came before the committee and asked that the bill be passed. I think in view of that that he has.

Mr. EMERSON. Many Members of the House will vote as the War Department recommends, believing that it is the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I think I can show that that is the fact when the time comes.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman may go too far in that, judging from what he said a moment ago, because I have knowledge of the fact that one distinguished officer in the Army came before the Senate Military Affairs Committee and testified, and then afterwards, because he heard from some other man high in authority, suppressed his testimony and it was never published. I am willing to do what the President thinks is necessary, but I am not willing to do what every man high in military authority thinks is necessary.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Does the gentleman think that the Cabinet would be represented before the committee with a bill that came from the War Department, under the authority of the War Department, and the President not be in favor of it?

Mr. RUCKER. I do not know as I catch the gentleman's question, but I do think that it is exceedingly questionable whether the President indorses all or some of the things that the War Department stands for.

Mr. FLOOD. This bill has the indorsement of the Secretary of War, who is in the President's Cabinet.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. The Secretary of War brought the bill before the committee of the House as an administration bill. I can not understand how it could be said that it does not have the indorsement of the President.

Mr. RUCKER. I do not mean to say that it has not; I merely say that the gentleman ought to have some authority for stating that it has.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. As to the extension of the age above 31 I hear litle or no complaint. It is expected, however, to provide only for 600,000 of the 2,300,000 desired.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. It will only provide 600,000 if you put them in the deferred classes. There are 10,000,000 men. Do you claim they can only get 600,000 out of that?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I am speaking on the authority of men who know something.

Mr. GORDON. Oh!

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I am informed by the men who have these matters in charge that they can produce only 600,000 men, and I take that in preference to the statements and views or theories of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. I just want to ask one question.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. And I have not yet gotten to the point. Go ahead.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. As I understand the McKenzie amendment, it is merely a suggestion by the representative body of the Government to the War Department.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. No; it is mandatory. It makes it necessary. The original bill contains the original suggestion.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. A gentleman speaking in favor of the bill and against the McKenzie amendment says the War Department could call the men and then the boys into the same camp, and send the boys first under the McKenzie amendment.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. Then it is merely a suggestion that the citizenship of this country, through their Representatives, suggests that the man power be raised first.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. The gentleman is mistaken about the scope of it.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. Is there any doubt about that being the wishes and the intent of the citizenship?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. As to the extension of the age above 31, I hear little or no complaint. It is expected, however, to produce for the Army only 600,000 men out of the 2,300,000 that are desired. I believe that it will be more beneficial in the production end than in the military end. There is no place in this country for the loafer and the nonproducer, and I do not care if such a one belongs to the idle rich or to the hobo class. He should not be a tax on the productive energy of the worker. "Work or fight" is the slogan. A slacker who reverses the scriptural rule by working on Sunday for double pay and who rests the greater part of the week is better fitted for the Army discipline than for a place in industrial life. I think this rule of work or fight should apply to everybody—rich or poor, labor, industrial, or agricultural. There should be no exception.

Useful occupation, as a rule, not as a slacker device, or fight! While I am on this point, I was glad to hear the Secretary of War say to the committee that he desired to relieve, as far as practicable, those who should remain at their industrial posts of the embarrassment of, claiming an exemption. Many men who should remain at their posts hesitate to claim deferred classification. They are forced, if they do, to align themselves with those who claim it and who should not.

No man who is at work along lines which enable him to render better service to his country should be embarrassed by claiming a deferred classification.

Only 600,000 fighting men are expected out of combing these deferred classifications. The extension of the age upward is therefore, in my judgment, of far greater service in swelling the army of industry and agriculture than in adding to the military man power.

Gen. March, in his testimony before the Senate committee, has said that the classes of 18, 19, and 20 year old youths would furnish better soldiers than the classes over 31. It will be necessary, in any event, to raise 1,700,000 men from the classes under 21.

In order to obtain the 600,000 men in the classes over 31 months must elapse before the 14 classes of about 13,000,000 men can be classified by the local boards with appeals to district boards.

It is here that the McKenzie amendment is pernicious.

The whole war program of the President is held up while the millions of men in the 32 to 45 classes are being classified. It took 15 months to classify the 10,000,000 in the first draft, and who can say how long it will take to classify the 13,000,000 in the present draft of those over the age of 31?

The McKenzie amendment does not permit the classes of 18 and 19 to be called until the classes of 31 to 45 have been exhausted, and if adopted it must postpone the calling of these young men until the classification of the classes 32 to 45 has been fully completed.

In the meantime the glorious opportunity of ending the war in 1919 may have passed away forever.

An illiterate but a great general of the Civil War was once asked the secret of military success. He replied, "Getting there fustest with mostest men."

Time is of the essence of military action, and yet gentlemen claim that they are in substance supporting the President's war program when they vote to make it impossible without exposing it to the dangers of costly delay.

The bill as drawn by the War Department provides for the classification by ages and places it entirely in the discretion of the President to call the classes at such times and in such order as he thinks proper.

Under this discretionary power the Secretary of War has explained to the committee that he does not intend to call the 18-year-old boys until all the other age classes have been exhausted.

The result on the 18-year-old class is that they will be the large constituent element of the 1,000,000 men army retained in this country.

There are now about 1,500,000 in the camps in this country, there are about 300,000 in class 1 not yet called out, there will be, according to estimates, 1,100,000 in classes 19 and 20, and there will be 600,000 in classes 32 to 45. So that if the 18-year-old class is not called out until the other classes have been utilized, it really means that the 18-year-old boys will be the army reserved in this country. The training they will receive will add greatly to their efficiency and to their safety, and when called for active service none of them will be any longer 18-year-old boys.

In the meantime thousands of them will be educated at Government expense in the schools this bill provides for.

There is nothing anomalous in the youths under 21 being called on to fight the battles of their country.

They are as much, if not more, interested in the free institutions of this country than older men. It is by virtue of these free institutions that an opportunity is held out to them of obtaining wealth, power, or any object of their ambition. They have more years of expectancy than older men.

There is nothing strange in finding them fighting for their country.

The young man called to service will find thousands and tens of thousands of young American patriots of his own age already on the firing line. Their feats on the battle fields of France have already added luster to the glory of American arms. He will fight by the side of British, French, and Italian youths, and he will fight against the Hun youth, some of whom are yet younger in years.

American history is full of the heroism of American youth. Nathan Hale died on the scaffold exclaiming that his only regret was that he had but one life to give to his country. He entered the military service before he attained his majority and died a few months thereafter. The Civil War on both sides was fought by its young men. The average age of the Civil War soldier was 19.

The issue therefore is fairly and clearly presented.

Gen. March has stated that if the bill as formulated by the War Department becomes a law he will have an army in France by the 1st of next July and bring the war to a glorious and speedy conclusion.

We can take him at his word or we can tie the hands of the President so as to hamper the proposed operation of the measure.

We should reflect that if by the vote we cast we prolong the war we may send to the slaughter thousands of the young men whom we are seeking to protect.

For myself I shall place full confidence in the discretion of the President and vote for the war program as he has proposed it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

By unanimous consent Mr. HARRISON of Virginia was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I have no word of criticism in word or thought of what may be said on this floor on this subject by any Member. This is a most difficult question. I am old-fashioned. I have always been accustomed to regard the military age in this country as commencing with 18, and in the Civil War it ended with 48. That has been the military age as far back as my familiarity with national history goes. Therefore I can not see the reason for great indignation over the fixing of 18 years as the minimum at the present time. In fact, there seems to be no question upon that point. We fix it in the bill at 18 to 45. The only question is as to whether we shall leave in the hands of the President, to whom we have entrusted the conduct of the war, the question of the order in which these men shall be taken. We trust all other military matters to the President, and he in turn entrusts them to his military advisers. Why should we make a different rule in this case? The military advisers believe it wise to conduct the campaign in this way. Why should we withhold from the President, as is proposed by this amendment, the power to dispose of his great Army as to him may seem best? It has been stated here on the floor that it is the intention of the President and the Secretary of War to put off the use of the 18-year-old men for some time, and I have no doubt that that is true. We have voted everything freely, and we ought to. We have voted money, we have voted powers of the most sweeping character, in order to carry on the war. Why should we put in an impediment at this time? It is painful for all of us to vote to fix the age at which men shall go to war. I presume that a great proportion of the Members of the House have sons who are affected by this law. As for myself, I have four. I am going to vote for this law, which will bring four of my sons under its terms. [Applause.] They would not have it otherwise, I am proud to say. I believe the emergency is so great, the perils to our country so overwhelming, that, so far as I am concerned, I am willing not only to vote the man power but everything else that we hold dear, and I am unwilling, even in appearance, to put an impediment in the way of the President and the soldiers to whom we have entrusted the conduct of this war. Therefore I shall vote against the pending amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the McKenzie amendment placing the men of the ages of 18 and 19, which it is proposed to draft under the bill, in separate classes to be called later than the men above 20; but I shall also offer, if I have the opportunity, or vote for if offered by some one else, an amendment eliminating from the draft men of 18 and 19 years of age.

Our one paramount purpose is to win this war. There is nothing that one of us would leave undone if necessary to win the war, but after the most careful consideration of the matter I am convinced that the drafting and the sending to the battle lines of Europe of the boys of 18 and 19 is not necessary to the triumph of our cause, fair to the boys, or good for the Nation.

Within 30 days the President has more than once expressed himself in a way to make it clearly evident that he doubted the wisdom, the advisability, or the necessity of reducing the draft age as it is now proposed to reduce it. Within a like period the Secretary of War has expressed himself in like manner, and his evidence before the Military Committees of the House and Senate within the past few days clearly evidences a doubt on his part even now of the necessity or of the wisdom of the reduction to the age of 18.

Before the Senate committee the Secretary stated that it was with the greatest reluctance that he had agreed to the proposal to reduce the draft age to 18. He called attention in his testimony before the House committee, as did the President, in a recent letter to Secretary Lane, to the harm that would come to the country should the education of the youth of the land be interfered with and interrupted as would occur if all able-bodied boys above 18 were inducted into the service.

We know that the men connected with the operation of the selective draft are and have been from a purely military standpoint favorable to the drafting of boys of 18, 19, and 20, and not only that, but the immediate use of such troops on the battle line as soon as they could be given a preliminary training. That was the military plan of a year ago when it was suggested by the War Department that the first army of a million men should be of men of 19 and 20. Such men are quickly trained. They are amenable to discipline; they are recklessly courageous; and our Washington military authorities not only want them drafted but they want the privilege of using them at once, and are therefore opposing the McKenzie amendment, which would put them in the last class to be called.

Neither the President nor the Secretary of War have been inclined to this purely military view, which is based partly on the desire for young troops and partly on the desire to take advantage of the present situation to establish a national system of universal military training, beginning with boys of 18. Even the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] admits he was shocked at the idea of drafting boys to fight our battles, but he says that he defers to the judgment of the military authorities. So do I in purely military matters, but in matters affecting a great national policy which appeals to the heart and sentiment of all of the people, which involves a question of right and justice, I can not wholly surrender my judgment to anyone. I certainly shall not surrender my judgment in a matter on which a layman is as well qualified to judge as a military man.

The gentlemen who say they yield their judgment in this matter to that of the military authorities mean that they accept the statements and figures of the military authorities as to the necessity of enrolling boys of 18 and 19 in order to secure the 2,000,000 men which are now desired. I have gone over all the figures presented by the department officials, and, in my opinion, they fail utterly to prove their contention. It is true that the table on page 7 of the report as to the number of men who would be available between the ages of 32 and 45, if accepted as entirely accurate, would strengthen the claim for younger men in the draft, but that table, in my opinion, is manifestly and grotesquely faulty and indefensible.

The table in question gives the total number of males between the ages of 32 and 45 as upward of 10,000,000, and from this figure the War Department immediately deduct practically the entire estimated number of married men, or about seven and three-quarters millions. The figures as given lack only about 1½ per cent of the total number of married men of these ages as estimated by the statistician of the Prudential Insurance Co., whose letter appears on page 11.

Not content with having proposed to excuse in advance all of the married men without regard to conditions of dependency the War Department then estimates 400,000 of these unmarried men as the number who would be given deferred classification on account of agriculture and other industries. Not content with this, the department then estimates that another 200,000 of them would be given deferred classification for reasons not given, and last and finally, according to this estimate of the War Department, 300,000 of these men from 31 to 45 will be so craven and unpatriotic as to become delinquents, whom the department would not have the energy or the intelligence to overtake and return to the service.

Of course, if we are only to obtain 600,000 men, or 6 per cent of the 10,000,000 to be enrolled between 31 and 45, as the War Department estimates, then it will be necessary to draft the children in order to get a fighting force; but I am not willing to believe that only 6 per cent of these men are fit or willing to serve their country, and that 94 per cent of them want to put the burden on the boys. Assuming for the sake of argument that the propriety of excusing all married men from military duty, could not the married men thus excused perform the other services for which the War Department is proposing in advance to excuse them?

But this is not the only reservoir of our man power. There are still nearly four and a quarter million men who were registered under existing drafts; half a million of them are in class 2.

Had as large a number of men in proportion to the population been called from all the States as were called from the State I have the honor to represent we would have an Army of 5,000,000 without any further extension of the draft whatever. Nearly 55 per cent of our enrolled men in Wyoming were placed in class 1, have been called, and are now serving with the colors. The average per cent throughout the country was less than 28 and in some States below 15. Why do the military authorities shrink from combing out in the States with the low percentages the slackers under the present draft? Why does it reach out its hands for the boys while declining to take the men who are already within its grasp and recorded on its rolls?

Mr. Chairman, I repeat, the American people have one paramount purpose, and that is to win this war; and if it were necessary in order to do it to call on the boys of 18 after utilizing the men of more mature age, no one would hesitate, in view of the character of the struggle and the absolute necessity of winning it. But I, Mr. Chairman, for one, am unwilling to admit that a Nation of nearly 110,000,000 of active, vigorous, forceful people has exhausted its man power in raising an Army of 3,000,000 men and must now call upon the boys to fight its battles. If this were true, there would be no more welcome news to the Kaiser and his cohorts; and the very fact that we seem to be admitting it to be true by lowering our draft age to a point below the ages of men called by either France or England tends to give aid and comfort to the enemy.

It proves nothing to say that boys of 16, 17, and 18 enlist voluntarily and make good soldiers. Such volunteers are the more mature, the more venturesome, the more self-reliant of their age, and, mixed with older men, they make splendid soldiers; but it is altogether a different thing to reach out the strong arm of the Federal Government and take from every home and every fireside the boys of 18 and 19. Napolean said of such troops in his day that, while valiant and courageous, their corpses strewed the roadsides and their tortured bodies filled the hospitals.

The McKenzie amendment would help, because it would tend at least to check the War Department in the sending of these boys abroad until at least a majority of the older men had been utilized; but if we are to enroll youths of 18 and 19 only to defer their induction into the service, what good purpose is there in enrolling them at all at this time? They will come in automatically under the draft a little later. In the meantime they can help on the farms and in the industries; they can continue their schooling; they can mature under the natural and healthy influences of their homes.

Why fill hundreds of thousands of homes with anxiety; why burden hundreds of thousands of mothers with anguish unnecessarily? We began this war as a man's war, compelling the service of none under voting age. Perhaps it might be well to reduce the age one year, but let us not make to the world a confession not founded on fact, that our man power is exhausted and that henceforth we must depend on youths. Let such of the youngsters as desire to and are qualified volunteer, but let us not compel them to serve in the years of their immaturity unless and until it shall be clearly necessary.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I take it that we all are of one opinion when it comes to the raising of these 2,000,000 men. We are in favor of raising the 2,000,000 of men provided for by this measure, and ten times 2,000,000 if necessary. If you will review the hearings before the committee and supplement these hearings with the speeches which have been made against the McKenzie amendment, there is but one deduction that follows, and that is that the conscripting of these boys between 18 and 21 is a mere matter of convenience. The gentlemen who have testified before the Committee on Military Affairs have admitted as much, saying that they can be taken into the Army with very little trouble, but that it will take a considerable length of time to revise and reclassify the conscription lists over that age. Now, if you will look at these hearings you will see that there are 10,028,973 men between the ages of 32 and 45. These 2,000,000 men can be taken from that class, and should be taken from that class, before we resort to the taking of young men between 18 and 21 years of age. As has already been stated here, I think it would be a calamity for this country at this time to say to the world that we are reduced to the extremity of taking the young men of this country beneath the age of 21 years, a thing that is not resorted to by any of the countries now involved in war, except Germany alone. And there is this thing that should be taken into consideration: It takes six men on this side of the sea to take care of one of those boys who is fighting in the trenches. We have already confronting us this condition, in so far as the agricultural interests of the country are concerned, that we have had to close the storehouses and shops and have had to invite the women out of the kitchens to go to the fields of Indiana and all over the United States to save the wheat crop and the oats crop that has just been gathered, and this will be equally true when it comes to gathering the corn crop. If you take these boys from 18 to 21 years of age, where are they going to come from? In the largest proportion from the agricultural districts of this country. So that while we are seeking to augment and strengthen our military forces, do not make the mistake, if you please, of depleting the resources of that section of this country upon whom these men in the trenches must depend.

I sometimes think we become too much obsessed by the things in which we are immediately engaged and do not pay enough attention to coordination or correlation. These men whose affairs it is to look to the military propositions and problems are obsessed with the importance of them alone. They do not look back behind the lines and look to the section of the country from which the resources must come to support the Army of the United States. Therefore I say we should be very slow for industrial reasons before we undertake to lower this age. Oh, but some one says that it would interfere with the great manufacturing industries of our commercial centers. It may interfere with these industries. They, too, must make sacrifices, all must make sacrifices, but it should be made to fall alike equally upon commercial industries and upon agricultural industries.

A consensus of the best military authorities of the world discloses that the best soldiers range between the ages of 25 and 30 years, inclusive. That soldiers between the ages of 18 and 21 are not mature either in body or judgment is also the experience of the best military authorities in the world.

Soldiers between the ages just stated, while they possess an abundance of bravery and energy, do not have the judgment of maturer men and do not know consequently how to protect themselves as these maturer men do. Their very impulsiveness impels them into danger that maturer men would not enter and subjects them to sacrifices that are unnecessary. There is no end to their bravery or daring on the battle field, but let one of them get wounded—and God knows there will be plenty of them wounded—or confined to the hospital by disease, then he becomes a boy again longing for his home. He has not the fortitude to withstand his ills that men of maturer age have.

If this is true why should we, with a fighting man power of 20,000,000 of men in the United States—that is a reservoir from which we can draw an army the like of which was never seen in any country—resort to the proposition contained in this measure? Why should we not furnish an army of men? Why should we not furnish the most efficient army instead of a deficient one? These are the questions that the fathers and mothers back home will ask. These are the questions that the farmers of this country will ask whose farms are already depleted of labor and which will be more greatly depleted than any other industry if this bill passes without amendment.

It has been admitted in debate here to-day by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] that men older than 45 years of age make good soldiers in the trench warfare and while thus engaged they are just as good as any other soldier. If this be true, and this being peculiarly a trench warfare, why not extend the age beyond 45 years, if necessary, and give the boy a chance? There is no occasion to nip the budding flower; far better would it be to utilize the fading flower.

I have one constituent who writes me that he has contributed six sons to this war, and if this bill passes unamended as to age it will take his only remaining son. He is 55 years old, and he asks that this bill be amended so as to include him and to leave this 18-year-old boy with his mother. I expect that this same petition, differing only as to number and age, has been offered up from every niche and corner of the country.

Before we confess to the world that we are reduced to the dire extremity of drafting immature boys into the Army we should pay some heed to those who are called upon to furnish these soldier boys. Every patriotic American citizen is willing to make the fullest sacrifice necessary to be made to win this war, but until the time comes when the immature manhood of this country must of necessity be sacrificed for this purpose it should not be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE].

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, we are all in favor of this measure, changing the draft, so that our Army all told will exceed 5,000,000 of men. We are only discussing here to-day the question of the McKenzie amendment.

We have at this time about 3,000,000 in our Army, of which about 1,400,000 are either on the other side or on the way over. The balance of our Army is in training in the United States. To-day the two armies on the western battle front almost balance exactly each other. It is possible that the armies of the allies exceed those of our enemies by from 2 to 4 or 5 per cent. The time has come when the officers of our Army and the officers of the armies of England, France, and Italy have determined that we must raise such an army that we will have a preponderance in man power. England and France will add as many men as Germany will be able to add. The United States must furnish the surplus.

Now, we are in the embarrassing position of being compelled to transport our Army to Europe and of supporting that Army with food and the necessary war equipment when we have placed it there. We have been able during the past few months to send over more than 250,000 men a month. We know now that we can transport the necessary men to Europe to assure us an Army by next June of 4,000,000 men, and we are assured by men whom we trust that we will have the ships that will enable our country and England to support that Army when we get it in France. It only remains for us to determine how we shall raise the necessary men.

Some of you are in favor of taking men of other classes. I have no quarrel with you, but my judgment leads me to believe that the men of 18 should be called before the men who have families to support are called. The men of 18 will make as good soldiers as the men that we now have in the Army. And much as I hate by my vote to call upon men of 18, 19, and 20 years to go into this terrible war, it is my duty to the Nation to support the measures best calculated to win this war in the least possible time, and I shall vote against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Alabama intends to close in one speech.

Mr. DENT. That is right, and I would like the gentleman to yield his time now.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the time is so short that I shall have to ask that I be not interrupted, and I should also like to have notice when I have occupied four minutes.

Mr. Chairman, we are in the same position that we were in the third year of the great Civil War. At that time Gen. Grant made up his mind that the only way to end that war was to follow the Confederate Army, and make that his object, and subject himself to all sorts of losses so as to defeat and destroy that army. For that reason we called upon the man power of the country. We are in the same position on the western front now. We want 5,000,000 men, of which about 1,000,000 will remain in the United States. Those 5,000,000 men must be drawn from our people while we are struggling with the problem, not of money, but of supplies; of our skilled laborers, our men in the factories. The deferred classes were drafted in England, but not until after two years of war, and then with great care, and after educating women to take the place of skilled workmen, so that five-sixths of the working people in the great shipbuilding establishments and iron works upon the Clyde are women, and 13,000 of the 20,000 who make high explosives, where I visited the factory, are women. Women now till the fields and have learned to do the skilled and heavy work of the farm. We would put our women to do the work of the factory and the farm if it becomes necessary. It can not be done without long and intensive training. It took two years in England, and we have not the two years. In this condition we can either send our boys to the front or we can attempt to put our women without training into our factories and make a failure of it. It is a practical question.

It must be left as a practical question to the President, who is the Commander in Chief and who is running this war, to say what ought to be done from day to day as conditions arise. I will not vote to limit his discretion by the McKenzie amendment.

A word as to the youth of the soldier. It is objected that young men lose their schooling if taken as soldiers. I want to say that if we talk about education, war is the best education that can be found anywhere. When I came to Congress over 100 Members had been in the war; more than half of them had enlisted at ages below 20 and some of them down to 18.

In the Fifty-fourth Congress there were 135 war veterans, of whom 64 had enlisted before they were 21—39 from the North and 25 from the South, viz, 1 at the age of 12, 1 at 13, 4 at 14, 6 at 15, 6 at 16 (besides 2 Virginia cadets), 4 at 17, 18 at 18, 11 at 19, and 13 at 20. Over a quarter of the House were Civil War veterans. These younger men had their education by that war. War is the greatest school that there is.

These facts tell whether it narrows or broadens a man to have served in a war, whether it does harm and affords an education or not. Our senior Senator from Minnesota enlisted when he was 18. One of the members of the Republican national committee was a boy of 16 when he left my side at school. He returned at 18 as captain of a company and has taken his place in the affairs of the Nation. Military training is the greatest education to be found. We want to afford all our boys a military training. Unless they are put in the Army they will not get it, but they can, if advisable, be kept at home with the million that stay here, so that they will be trained and ready for service abroad when that service is required.

Now, with reference to that training, I have one request to make of the House. I would like to extend my remarks in the RECORD, but I would like also to file a separate extension in reference to training in rifle practice and the work that has been done on that subject in the State of New Jersey. I make that request, Mr. Chairman. It will include some documents. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to include in his remarks the documents indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, this being a bill to increase the man power of the Army as recommended by the General Staff, I, of course, intend to support it, as I have supported every other war measure, but I feel that it is my duty to bring to the attention of the House the fact that there is a source of man power that has been practically untapped that amounts, according to reliable estimates, to in the neighborhood of two millions of men, or will amount to two millions of men when the next registration is completed.

Aliens who owe allegiance to cobelligerent countries, except England and Canada, have not been called upon to do their duty in this war, and, according to a recent report of the Provost Marshal General, under the registration of June 5 there were aliens owing allegiance to cobelligerent countries registered to the number of 772,744. The total number called was 281,982, and the total number accepted was 49,276, which goes to show conclusively that the aliens are taking advantage of the exemption on account of alienage provided for in the conscription law and are evading service under that provision.

The Provost Marshal's report to the Secretary of War, which I have referred to, on the subject of the first draft under the selective-service act, and which contained the foregoing figures, also contained the following statements:

An overwhelming majority of the boards, to be sure, report that no appreciable number of aliens were willing to serve; some boards say, "A few were willing."

The report also contains the following:

As between neutral aliens, allied aliens, and aliens allied with the enemy, were there differences of attitude?

The boards' answers to this question are rather indefinite, but it seems probable that while allied and neutral aliens are more sympathetic in their atttiude toward the selective-service law than are aliens allied with the enemy, their sympathy does not very often find expression in an eagerness to serve in the Army. As between allied and neutral aliens, a number of boards say the allied aliens showed a better attitude, but there are one or two boards who found the neutral aliens the more willing to serve.

The facts are, because of the provision in the selective-service law exempting aliens from military service solely on account of alienage, there are thousands upon thousands of aliens owing allegiance to the countries with which the United States is associated in the present war who have claimed this exemption and who are in fact the worst kind of slackers. Aliens of the cobelligerent countries should never have been exempted in the original law, except where there were treaty agreements which made the exemption of the subjects of certain countries necessary. I shall, therefore, at the proper time introduce an amendment to the pending bill under consideration as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MCCULLOCH: After section 1 add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. No alien who is a citizen or subject of any of the countries cobelligerent with the United States in the present war shall, unless contrary to existing treaties, be granted exemption from military service or placed in deferred classification under the provisions of this act or under any rule or regulation to be issued by authority granted under the provisions of this act solely on account of alienage: And provided further, That the War Department shall, immediately after the passage of this act, reclassify all aliens heretofore registered who are citizens or subjects of any of the countries cobelligerent with the United States in the present war and who have been exempted or placed in deferred classification on account of alienage, and said aliens shall be immediately called for service unless such action would be contrary to existing treaties: Provided further, That the act of May 18, 1917, is hereby amended accordingly."

If this amendment is adopted, it will bring immediately into the service aliens owing allegiance to the cobelligerent countries. It need not interfere with the treaty negotiations which are now in progress, but without doubt would hasten and perhaps insure prompt action. Any country that refuses to enter into conventions for technical or diplomatic reasons would find such methods of no avail, for the alien would be taken anyway. If existing treaties would be violated, the provision would not be operative under the express terms of the amendment.

I am moved to introduce this amendment because of the delay of over a year in getting the treaties drafting aliens completed, and because I was informed just a few hours ago that there would be further delays. The time for delay in this matter is past. The aliens must go just as the American boy must go, and right now—not next year or when this war is over.

The United States Government has temporized too long with the alien situation in this country. When I say the United States Government, I am glad to be able to except the House of Representatives. For this House passed a number of months ago by an overwhelming vote the Burnett alien slacker bill, which was strangled to death in another body. And this House passed by an almost unanimous vote the amendment to the last Army appropriation bill to make effective the treaties that the State Department represented to Congress were practically ready for signature and ratification. This amendment was also passed by the Senate and became a law, but with the exception of England and Canada, aliens are still exempt and the State Department has not succeeded, even though there has been a delay of over a year and promise after promise made, in getting these aliens into the service. Citizens of France, of Greece, of Italy, of Serbia, of Belgium, and the other allied countries, who represent a source of man power in this country, estimated at close to two millions of men, are free from military service in their own countries, because they have come to America and are still exempt from military service in this country solely because of the delay of the State Department in completing the conventions which were necessary to be completed in order to make the legislation passed by Congress effective and bring these aliens into the service.

I was surprised beyond expression in words when questioning the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs on the floor of the House a little while ago to find that although the War Department is demanding that every available source of man power in this country be utilized, that the draft ages for drafting American citizens should be increased to 45 and reduced to 18, so that every American citizen and every boy between the ages of 18 and 45 would be immediately liable to call for military service; when it is being suggested that the rules governing dependency should be materially modified and that men from every walk of life should be taken into the service, in the face of this overwhelming necessity not a syllable of testimony was developed before the Military Affairs Committee, and not a single excuse given, why the enormous reservoir of man power represented by the citizens and subjects of the cobelligerent countries in America had not been touched; not a word as to why for over a year, when everybody else has been required to make sacrifices, that the alien remained free from all obligations to serve either in the American Army or the army of the country to which he owes allegiance.

I am glad to feel and know that I have done my part to the very best of my ability to see to it that America is not made a haven of refuge for alien slackers.

Immediately after the announcement by the War Department of the draft quota apportionment, when the injustice of exempting aliens became apparent I called the attention of the Secretary of War to the injustice that was being done and urged that action be taken immediately to cure it. The Secretary of War, in answer to a brief upon this subject I filed with him on July 17, 1917, admitted the inequity and indicated that his department would not be opposed to the drafting of aliens. From that moment on I have used every effort within my power to secure some action, somehow, that would make the alien serve somewhere. After the Burnett bill had died in the Senate and the State Department, although action was delayed for over a year, had accomplished nothing material, I took the matter up with the President of the United States, and on the occasion of a personal interview I called to the President's attention every detail of the situation and pointed out to him personally the great injustice that was being done the American boy by taking him away to war and leaving the alien slacker here at the American boy's home to take his position and profit by his absence. I do not feel at liberty to make public anything the President said to me, but I believe it is perfectly proper for me to say that I was satisfied at the close of my interview that the President was in sympathy with the effort that I had been making. But, in the face of everything that has been done on this important matter, the aliens, with the exception of those from England and Canada, are still free from liability to service, and I am convinced that the time for temporizing is past; the State Department has failed to get results, and I was informed only yesterday that because of some trivial differences in the technical wording of the conventions, that we can expect further delay. Therefore Congress should take this matter into its own hands and by an amendment to this bill, such as I propose to submit for the consideration of the House at the proper time, which, by its express terms, provides that no existing treaties shall be violated, require that the citizens and subjects of cobelligerent countries resident in the United States shall be immediately called for military service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time, which I believe is eight minutes, to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am for the bill as it was originally drafted by our military authorities and seriously and emphatically recommended to the Congress by the Secretary of War, and I am opposed to the so-called McKenzie amendment.

In the few minutes at my disposal I shall endeavor to give you some of the reasons that bring me strongly to this position. We are at war. I repeat it, my friends, because we are apt to forget that we are at war. War is not a condition in which we can indulge sentiment, not a condition in which we can think of this individual, or that, or the other. War is a condition in which there should be but one supreme thought, and that is the welfare of our country. The welfare of our country to-day calls for this legislation to be enacted into law as it was scientifically designed. We need the young men and the old men to bear the burdens of the day.

In the name of the youth of our land between the ages of 18 and 20 I refute the aspersions that have been cast upon their character, their strength, and their patriotism by some here to-day who spoke of them as "infants in the cradle." [Applause.] Since men first marched to battle in a holy cause the youth of the country, in a mental state of ideality, when patriotism and lofty motives are supreme, have marched with their elders, and their deeds are written on every battle field of the world's history. It is an aspersion upon their strength and their character to say that young men of the age I have named are not able and willing to shoulder their rifles and bear their full part in this struggle.

Do we need the youth and the elder men? Yes. In the hearings had upon this bill I read the following question propounded, and this the Secretary of War himself answered. "I asked the Surgeon General for a formal opinion as to the changes he would recommend in the bill as drafted in the light of the experience of other countries and our own experience. The Surgeon General independently came out with the suggestion of 18 to 45, so that the Surgeon General's opinion sustains that arrived at by the General Staff."

Here you find the medical authority—and there is no higher medical authority in the world—of Surg. Gen. Gorgas and his staff, telling you that in the war that is now in progress our country needs the men from 18 to 45, and he himself suggested that they are of the quality and character that we should call upon for service now.

A little further on I read this—and in order that you may be advised, if you care to look this up, I will say that it is in the hearings before the Senate committee. I find this question was asked:

> Senator JOHNSON. So, in order to carry out the purposes for which we have entered this war, successfully to prosecute it, this particular measure you deem essential?

That was asked of Secretary of War Baker, and this is his reply:

> I believe that to be the fact. My own judgment about it originally was that 19 should be the minimum, and I came to the 18 minimum only after very thorough study of the situation, and with some reluctance, but finally believing it to be necessary to secure the appropriate number of men.

When the present Secretary of War has been convinced by a thorough study of the problem that our exigency requires these men of the ages mentioned, who is there in the land that dare lift his voice and say it must not be so? I can hardly imagine anyone more solicitous than the Secretary of War to protect the manhood and the youth of our land.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can not now. I have not the time. There is one more authority that should speak, and I give you his word—the Chief of Staff, Gen. March, one of the most splendid soldiers that ever wore the American uniform. This question was asked him:

Question (by Senator REED). As a matter of fact, is it not your opinion that it is better for the country, better for the Army, better for the service, to call out these younger classes—that is, the men 18, 19, and 20 years of age—than it is to call out the men 32 and up? Is not that your personal opinion?

To which Gen. March replied:

My opinion is unqualifiedly in favor of the young man. The young men between 18 and 20 are usually not married; they have not settled down in life; they have not any incumbrances; and they are better off physically.

There can be no doubt in the mind of any man who has walked in the trenches, who has endured the terrible strain of the life of the front, when storms gather and skies weep, that young men of the kind who have been aspersed here to-day are the kind that best of all bear the burden. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have one more word that I wish to say. Can I not have just one minute in which to say it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from California control the time. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. DENT. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I had some other things I desired to say from my own standpoint, but I want to give you a word fresh from the front. But yesterday I received a letter from one of the generals now in command of one of the Army corps of the United States, whose name, for obvious reasons, I withhold, but I want you to hear his words. He is there where shells are bursting and men are dying. He says:

To all of us here the cordial support of you men in Congress is a source of great satisfaction. I do not think there is anything that would take the ginger out of the command more than to feel that Congress was not giving them cordial support in every way.

And I say to you, my friends, that if you shackle the administration in this bill by telling them when they can take men of 18 and 19 and when they can not, you are not giving our men on the battle field support in a cordial and generous way. Let us uphold their hands and support them to the utmost. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DENT. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized until 5 o'clock.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, as my time is so short, I request not to be interrupted. I desire to advert to several matters that have come up in the debate here.

I have discovered no disposition on the part of any Member of either branch of Congress to withhold from the President all the men and money he has asked for since the beginning of this war. The question of how many men are necessary in this war is a military matter, and upon that I gladly defer to the judgment of the military department. Gen. March says he wants to put 80 divisions in the field next June. That would be 3,200,000 men. Upon that question I offer no comment, but accept the judgment of the military authorities.

But when it comes to the question of drafting the citizens of your country, when you have a reservoir of man power, which has been so much referred to, of over 20,000,000 men, I do say that the question of whether or not you will go to drafting boys at this stage of the proceedings is solely and exclusively a question for Congress and not for the military authorities. Why, Gen. March testified before our committee less than two months ago that a man of 26 was very much superior—he did not put it exactly that way, but answered without hesitation in a reply to an inquiry by the Secretary of War as to which was the better material for soldiers, men of 21 or 26, and he said, "Oh, the man of 26." Of course, any man of common sense knows that is so.

Members have referred to the large number of available men in the United States as bearing directly on this question. My own judgment is that the authority in this bill to draft boys 18 and 19 years of age ought to be stricken out. There is no necessity for it. Some gentlemen here have intimated that whenever a man in the War Department tells you that a piece of legislation is necessary, even if it is woman suffrage, Congress is bound by that judgment. The Member of Congress who says that does not understand the functions of his office. This is a question peculiarly within the province of Congress. When we stand on this floor and say to the President, "We are ready to vote you all the men and all the money you say is necessary to prosecute this war," we are performing our full duty. Those of us who favor striking out the provision, and, if we can not do that, favoring the McKenzie amendment, propose to give the President better men than he is asking for, if we are to assume that he is supporting this bill as originally introduced; because we call in the testimony of his own military advisers, the highest military authority in the Army, the Chief of Staff, in which he says the man of 26 is better than the man of 21. Is there any doubt in the mind of any man here that men above 20 are better than boys of 18 and 19 years old? Of course there is not. This proposition that boys make better soldiers than men had its origin in cowardice and slackerism; there is where it originated.

Men stand up and argue in the face of common sense. Is there a man on this floor who is not capable of determining whether the physical power of a man is superior to that of a boy? Of course there is not. Those who pretend otherwise are simply trying to fool themselves. This is the same question we had up when the draft bill was here and it was recommended that we should draft those between the ages of 19 and 25. I remember the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], who addressed you so eloquently on this bill, was in favor of the ages of 19 and 25, and made a speech on the military prowess of the boys right in face of the statement of the Secretary of War that if we gave him authority he would draft a million boys 19 to 20 years old. That was stated on the floor of the House, and everyone understood it. Right in the face of that he made a speech adhering to it, and out of more than 200 votes on the floor his proposition received just 6 votes. That was the judgment of this House at that time. I have seen nothing to change it; I have seen no evidence to show that boys have increased in physical efficiency by the lapse of one year and a half.

Why, he says we are at war. I have heard that statement repeatedly. Of course we are at war; we are in the g eatest war in the history of this world, a man's war, and we ought to have men to fight it.

I shall support the McKenzie amendment. If I could have my way, I would strike out the ages of 18 and 19 and make 20 the minimum age on the ground of efficiency. When men stand here and tell me that with 20,000,000 men in this country we are reduced to the absolute necessity of drafting boys they simply speak against common sense. No man on this floor believes any such thing as that. A good deal has been said about the fact that these men between 20 and 45 are articulated with the social and business organizations of the country, which might be interfered with if they did the fighting for the country. Of course, that is true. As a matter of fact, your boys 18 and 19 years old are articulated with social interests of the country. Most of them live in and are a part of their homes, and they are attached to their homes, and men even beyond the military age very much prefer to go into the war and fight, if they could, and could be accepted, rather than send these immature boys. [Applause.] We have heard the Secretary of War quoted here as to the military necessity of drafting these boys. I want to read you what the Secretary of War said in an authorized statement on June 13 last. That statement was repeated by Gen. Crowder in the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, and you will find it on page 20 of the hearings dated June 10–18. This is the authorized statement given out by the War Department on June 13, 1918:

WASHINGTON, June 13.

In view of many reports that the War Department was to ask modification of the draft law and extend the present age limit, Secretary of War Baker to-day authorized the statement that no such plan was under consideration.

The present provision for drafting men between the ages of 21 and 31 satisfies military requirements and there is no need whatever, it is explained, to look beyond those age limits now or in the near future. Mr. Baker would be opposed to any proposition to extend the age limit at present for the reason that he regards this as entirely unnecessary.

Now, what has happened since the 13th of June to change that situation? If we admit that he has changed his mind, what reasons have been given for it? You have the statement of the Chief of Staff that he wants to put 80 divisions in France of 40,000 men each by the first of July next, which would amount to 3,200,000 men, and adding 1,000,000 in this country you have a little more than 4,200,000 men. Is it possible that this House is going to vote to give notice to the wide world, including the public enemy, that we are reduced to the extremity in the second year of the war of drafting boys? Let me call your attention to the fact that in the great Civil War, when this country was fighting for its national existence, and when we were going through all the stress the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] tells about in the third year of the war, never during that whole war, lasting four years, did they reduce the draft age below 20. That was the minimum draft age during the Civil War.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. All time has expired, and under the unanimous-consent agreement the committee will automatically rise.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12731, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADMISSION OF REFUGEE ALIENS INTO THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 1262).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Acting Secretary of State, submitting a draft of a joint resolution authorizing the admission into the United States of aliens who are refugees from conditions created by the war.

I earnestly recommend this humane project to the favorable consideration of Congress.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 22, 1918.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES SUBJECT TO MILITARY SERVICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and to lie on the Speaker's table:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of June 29, 1918, requesting the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Food Administrator, Fuel Administrator, and all boards and commissions appointed by Executive order since April 6, 1917, who were on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years, for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such administrators, boards, or commissions and allowed; the name and home address of each such person; the character of work he is performing in the service of such administrators, boards, or commissions, and the length of time he has been in such service, I transmit herewith statements from the United States Food Administration, the United States Fuel Administration, the War Industries Board, the War Trade Board, the Alien Property Custodian, and the Committee on Public Information showing the employees for whom exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked.

WOODROW WILSON.

The WHITE HOUSE, 22 August, 1918.

UNITED STATES FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, July 8, 1918.

DEAR MR. TUMULTY: I am inclosing herewith copy of letter and statement forwarded to Congressman WILLIAM J. FIELDS on July 2, which answers the request contained in your letter of July 6 to Mr. Hoover.

Faithfully, yours, ——— ———.

Mr. JOSEPH P. TUMULTY,
Secretary to the President,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

JULY 2, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM J. FIELDS,
Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FIELDS: I am submitting herewith a complete list of members of the Food Administration for whom requests have been made for deferred classification.

Faithfully, yours, ——— ———.

JULY 1, 1918.

The following members of the Food Administration at one time or another received deferred classification in the draft as a result of direct request by the Food Administration for such classification:

With the exception of one individual, marked (*), requests for indorsement for deferred classification for members outside of Washington have been refused.

Name and home address.	Length of service.	Character of work.
Aronson, Morris, Chicago, Ill.[1]	9 months	Assistant, License Division.
Barker, Charles A., Los Angeles, Cal.[2]	6 months	Mail censor, License Division.
Baruch, Fred., jr., San Francisco, Cal.[3]	8½ months	Chief, Correspondence Section.
Brown, Edwin C., Minneapolis, Minn.[4]	6 months	Assistant and attorney in the Enforcement Division.
Coe, Arthur F., Los Angeles, Cal.[5]	9 months	Secretary and assistant to head of division.
*Hitchcock, C. N., New York City [6]	8 months	Office manager, Grain Corporation, New York City.
Hill, Charles A., Fresno, Cal.[7]	6½ months	Chief in License Division.
Lane, Mortimer B., St. James, N. Y.[8]	1 year	Statistician.
Larsen, L. A., Manistee, Mich.[9]	1 year 1 month	Head of Mailing Division.
MacGregor, William E., Minneapolis, Minn.[10]	6 months	Attorney in Enforcement Division.
Maxon, Mark E., Cortland, N. Y.[11]	5½ months	Chief in License Division.
Miner, John Rice, Orono, Me.[12]	1 year	Biometrician.

Yocum, Trell W., Cleveland, Ohio [20]	do	Chief of Trade and Technical Journals Section.

[1] Mr. Aronson is exceptionally well qualified for his position as dictator of correspondence, and as such positions can be filled only by men with special training in dictation, his place could not, without great difficulty, be filled should he leave us.

[2] Mr. Barker is mail censor in our License Division. His work involves a knowledge of all rulings regarding licenses, regulations, etc., and a thorough knowledge of the work of the entire division to assure uniformity and accuracy in correspondence.

[3] Mr. Baruch has charge of the correspondence in our License Division, and has under him 4 dictators and about 20 stenographers and clerks. He had been rejected as unfit for military service and certified for limited service only.

[4] Mr. Brown is personal assistant to the Chief of our Enforcement Division, and because of his legal education and experience and his personal qualifications he could not be replaced without hindering the effective operation of this administration. He was rejected by the second officers' training camp because of broken arches.

[5] Mr. Coe has shown special aptitude for the work delegated to him, and his position as secretary and assistant to the head of our License Division is one of responsibility, and we do not feel that he could be replaced without great difficulty.

[6] Mr. Hitchcock, in his position of office manager of our Grain Corporation in New York, is rendering very valuable service, and he is an extremely capable man. He was classified for limited service by the military examining authorities, being under weight for regular military classification.

[7] Mr. Hill has charge of tabulations and special records in our License Division, and has supervision of from 45 to 50 clerks. He is very valuable to us in this position, and we felt justified in asking for deferred classification.

[8] Mr. Lane is in charge of the grain statistics section of our Statistical Division, and has charge of the bulletin service maintained in that division, for which he is well qualified.

[9] Mr. Larsen organized and is at present in charge of our Mailing Division, and having been with the Food Administration since its inception he has a thorough knowledge of the personnel and activities of the Food Administration, which is very essential in the correct distribution of our mail. Aside from this, he is just recuperating from a very serious illness and it is doubtful if he would ever be fit for active military service.

[10] Mr. MacGregor is employed in the capacity of attorney in our Enforcement Division and is extremely valuable in his position. His present health is not very good, and in 1916 he was refused enlistment in the Army as he could not pass the physical examination.

[11] Mr. Maxon has charge of the reviewing, checking, and correcting of applications for licenses and has supervision over about 30 clerks. He holds a responsible position and has shown himself very proficient in the execution of his work.

[12] Mr. Miner is employed as biometrician in our Statistical Division. He has had exceptional training in mathematics and, in particular, actuarial and biometrical phases of mathematics. On account of his special training and aptitude for the work of Statistical Division, we feel that it would be almost impossible to find anyone who can do exactly the work which Mr. Miner is doing for the Food Administration.

[13] Mr. Nairn is a statistician in our Statistical Division and has had special training in statistical work. He has had charge of special reports dealing particularly with cereal production and stocks, and his experience and qualifications have rendered his services very valuable to us.

[14] Mr. Norris is a statistician in our Statistical Division and has had special training for this work. He could not be replaced without affecting the efficiency of our organization.

[15] Mr. Padgett is head draftsman in our Statistical Division: created this particular section, and his familiarity with the details makes his retention important.

[16] Mr. Stammer has rendered faithful and efficient service in our License Division, and his legal training and familiarity with the work of that division make him a very valuable man. He has charge of personnel and general supervision of the work of entire division.

[17] Mr. Strauss in his position as private secretary to the Food Administrator is employed on work of a very difficult and confidential nature. His long service with the Food Administration is one of the prime requisites for such a position.

[18] Mr. Sutter is in charge of a section of about 15 clerks attending to alterations of licenses and license records. He had been rejected as unfit for military service and certified for limited service only.

[19] Mr. Wyman, as a digest clerk, is retained owing to his familiarity with all of the work of the Food Administration. It would require many months of training for a new man to fulfill his duties.

[20] Mr. Yocum's deferred classification was requested because of his value as chief of our Trade and Technical Journals Section. He was rejected by first and second officers' training camps because of a post-operative hernia.

UNITED STATES FUEL ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., July 8, 1918.

Hon. J. P. TUMULTY,
Secretary to the President, the White House, Washington.

MY DEAR MR. TUMULTY: In accordance with your request of July 6, I am inclosing on a separate sheet a list of those members of the Fuel Administration for whom I have asked exemption from military duty or deferred classification.

The total number for whom applications have been approved is 10. Of this number only six are now connected with the Fuel Administration. One of the four members formerly belonging to the Fuel Administration has entered the aviation branch of the service.

I am also inclosing a copy of a notification that I sent to the heads of all departments of the Fuel Administration on January 19, 1918, showing that a certificate of physical disability from some draft board or some officer of the United States duly authorized to examine persons for military service would be necessary in order to gain my approval of such application,

Sincerely, yours,

H. A. GARFIELD,
United States Fuel Administrator.

UNITED STATES FUEL ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1918.

To the heads of all departments:

Various requests have been made to the Fuel Administrator by persons in the employ of the administration who are within the draft age for approval of application for deferred classification under the draft regulation.

In order that our consideration of these applications may be upon a basis fair to all, I have decided that in the future no such applications will be approved unless there is presented with them a certificate of "physical disability" from some draft board or some officer of the United States duly authorized to examine persons for military service.

All applications of this character should be referred to the legal department.

H. A. GARFIELD,
United States Fuel Administrator.

WAR INDUSTRIES BOARD,
Washington, July 18, 1918.

Hon. JOSEPH P. TUMULTY,
Secretary to the President, White House.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The attached is a list of employees of the Southern Pine Emergency Bureau for whom deferred classification has been requested. While these men are not employed by the War Industries Board, yet the Southern Pine Emergency Bureau is cooperating with the lumber section of this board in the placing of Government orders.

While these deferred classifications have been asked for by the Southern Pine Emergency Bureau, yet the lumber section of this board has called attention to the importance of the work being performed by these men, together with the difficulty of replacing them. I therefore send you this list so there will be no misunderstanding about the action of the War Industries Board.

Very truly, yours,

BERNARD M. BARUCH.

WAR INDUSTRIES BOARD,
Washington, July 17, 1918.

Hon. JOSEPH P. TUMULTY,
Secretary to the President,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In compliance with the President's request, and in answer to House resolution 392, I attach list of employees of the War Industries Board who were on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31, for whom requests for deferred classifications have been asked. No request for exemption from military service has been made for any employee of this board.

Very truly, yours,

BERNARD M. BARUCH.

WAR TRADE BOARD,
Washington, July 17, 1918.

Hon. J. P. TUMULTY,
Secretary to the President,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. TUMULTY: In the letter I forwarded to the President, under date of July 15, in reply to your letter of July 6, in which you asked for a list of the names of the men for whom deferred classification has been asked by the War Trade Board, I find that on list A the name of Mr. J. L. Andrews, whose history follows, was not included:

"Name: J. L. Andrews.
"Home address: 55 Linwood Avenue, Bogota, N. J.
"Duties: Secretary to Mr. Chadbourne, member of the board.
"Classification under draft: IV–A.
"Date entered service: December 8, 1917."

I also want to call your attention to the fact that also on list A Mr. Milton A. Young's name should read Milton L. Young.

I greatly regret this oversight and beg to remain,

Very truly, yours,

VANCE MCCORMICK, Chairman.

WAR TRADE BOARD,
Washington, July 15, 1918.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: This is in reply to Mr. Tumulty's letter of July 6. In it he requests a statement in accordance with House resolution 392, showing the members of this organization for whom deferred classification has been asked.

I beg to inclose three lists, as follows:

List A gives information of those who are still in our service and for whom deferred classification has been asked and granted. Some of these, you will note, due to either physical unfitness or dependency, have been placed in a later classification than class 3, division 1.

List B shows the names of those who are still in our service for whom deferred classification had been asked and granted. Their respective local draft boards, however, as a result of a subsequent review, have been informed that we no longer consider their services indispensable now that the War Trade Board has passed through the early stages of organization.

List C shows the names of those for whom deferred classification has been asked and who have subsequently resigned and the draft boards informed at the time of their resignation.

Yours, respectfully,

VANCE MCCORMICK, Chairman.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION,
Washington, D. C., July 11, 1918.

Hon. JOSEPH P. TUMULTY,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. TUMULTY: Reporting to the President in reply to House resolution 392, I have the honor to submit the following information:

In connection with the domestic work of the Committee on Public Information, carried on by an appropriation of Congress, there are no male employees between the ages of 21 and 31.

In the foreign section, which operates out of the President's fund, there are just three employees for whom a deferred classification has been asked:

Carl Byoir, engaged October 1, 1917; home address, Des Moines, Iowa, and New York City.

Mr. Byoir, as associate director of the foreign section, has particular charge of the 33 foreign-language groups organized in the United States and is in charge of all the routine connected with the administration of the offices that we may maintain in the various foreign countries. I asked a deferred classification over his own protest, because he is absolutely necessary to the proper discharge of this important work.

Kenneth Durant, engaged May 16, 1917; home address, Philadelphia, Pa.

Mr. Durant came to the committee upon the personal recommendation of Sir Gilbert Parker, who had employed him throughout 1916 to prepare a digest of American opinion for the British Cabinet. Mr. Durant is assistant to the director of the foreign cable service, and, as in the case of Mr. Byoir, I asked a deferred classification over his protest, because he was absolutely necessary to the work.

Julius B. Kaupis, engaged April 20, 1918; home address, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Mr. Kaupis was selected by the Lithuanian National Alliance, and as he knows the workings of this great foreign group more than any other man, I have asked a deferred classification for him until we can complete an effective organization of the Lithuanians in America.

Respectfully,

GEORGE CREEL, Chairman.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is there any chance of any change in program from that announced between the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] in respect to the proceedings to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. Not that the Chair knows of.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I thought I would draw the Speaker's teeth on that subject.

The SPEAKER. Very well.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 23, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a tentative draft of bill authorizing transfer of land known as Craney Island from War Department to Treasury Department and Fishermans Island from Treasury Department to War Department (H. Doc. No. 1258); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting tentative draft of proposed bill to amend section 4 of chapter 5 of "An act making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1259); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting tentative draft of proposed bill to amend the one hundred and eighteenth article of war and authorize the calling into service of dismissed or discharged officers (H. Doc. No. 1260); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting copy of the report of the commission in Valuation Docket No. 2, Texas Midland Railroad (H. Doc. No. 1261); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WEBB: A bill (H. R. 12801) to amend section 1 of Title VII of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. AYRES: A bill (H. R. 12802) to provide for the erection of a public building at Eldorado, Kans.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds

By Mr. DONOVAN: A bill (H. R. 12803) to establish a national conservatory of music and art for the education of advanced pupils in music in all its branches, vocal and instrumental, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 12804) to add certain lands on the North Fork of the Shoshone River to the Shoshone National Forest; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CRISP: A bill (H. R. 12805) granting a pension to Baxter Hogan; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DOOLITTLE: A bill (H. R. 12806) granting a pension to Lou Alice Clay; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HELVERING: A bill (H. R. 12807) granting an increase of pension to Ira C. Sage; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRODBECK: Letters from citizens of New Oxford, Adams County, Pa., urging immediate passage of war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DALE of New York: Petition of Eugene F. Cooke, president of the American Federation of Catholic Societies, Brooklyn Diocesan Branch, protesting against amending the draft law so as to include young men between 18 and 21 years old; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ELSTON: Petitions of Epworth Methodist Church, Berkeley; the St. James Presbyterian Church, Oakland; the Women's Home and Foreign Missionary Society, Berkeley; and the Methodist Episcopal Church, Oakland, all in the State of California, favoring war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MAGEE: Petition of Mrs. Almon E. Smith, North Syracuse, N. Y., for national bone-dry prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Mrs. Henry Milbank, of Syracuse, N. Y., in favor of a national bone-dry law; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Mr. J. C. Burrows and others, of De Witt, Onondaga County, N. Y., in favor of war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RAKER: Resolutions adopted by 28 boards of northern California, in re passage of an amendment to the draft act, raising the age limit to 45 years; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. REED: Petition of 100 members of the Clarksburg (W. Va.) Woman's Christian Temperance Union, signed by Mrs. Amos Payne, president, and Mrs. B. F. Robinson, Mrs. J. D. McReynolds, and Mrs. S. C. Watkins, executive officers, protesting against lowering of the draft age; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, memorial of the Rotary Club of Clarksburg, W. Va., favoring more stringent laws relative to the punishment and suppression of the activities of pro-German sympathizers in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TEMPLE: Petition of Rev. M. M. Allbeck, of the Grace Lutheran Church, Monongahela, Pa., favoring war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon.

TEXAS MIDLAND RAILROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting a copy of the report of the commission in valuation Docket No. 2, Texas Midland Railroad, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Koch Vegetable Tea Co. of Winona, Minn., and a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Dr. Ward Medicine Co., of Winona, Minn., remonstrating against an increased tax on alcohol, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of sundry citizens of West Scarboro, Me., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COLT presented a petition of the congregation of the First Baptist Church of Wickford, R. I., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR GALLINGER.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 292, submitted by Mr. NELSON on the 22d instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the President pro tempore in arranging for and attending the funeral of the Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER, late a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. ASHURST introduced a bill (S. 4881) for the survey and allotment of lands within the Colorado River Indian Reservation in the States of Arizona and California, for the disposal of the surplus lands after allotment, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CHANGES IN DRAFT AGE.

Mr. STERLING submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4856) to amend sections 2, 4, and 5 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION.

On motion of Mr. SMOOT is was Ordered, That 16,000 additional copies of Senate Report No. 555, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, entitled "Aircraft Production in the United States," be printed for the use of the Senate Document Room.

CHANGES IN DRAFT AGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4856) to amend sections 2, 4, and 5 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hitchcock	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	Nugent	Smoot
Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Sterling
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Sutherland

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is necessarily absent, owing to illness.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. BAIRD] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the importance of the bill now pending in the Senate can not possibly be overestimated, not only as being the method of giving us an immediate increase of man power but also because it will have a great effect on public opinion everywhere. Of course, we could get a great many more men out of the present draft ages, but owing to the large number between 21 and 31 who are employed in essential industries, whether rightly or wrongly, and are exempted on that account, we are obliged necessarily to go beyond the ages originally established.

When we were considering the draft question last June I then spoke briefly and expressed the hope that it might not become necessary to take boys as young as 18, for educational reasons, but if it was necessary that they must be taken. I think it is clearly necessary that we should turn to the great reservoir of men, the largest reservoir of men that we have, between 18 and 20, in order to supply our Army.

Mr. President, there seems to be a disposition to shrink from making that limitation at 18. I need not rehearse the figures of the Civil War, where, as I recall it, a very large majority of the Army was under 21.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Under 19.

Mr. LODGE. Under 19. There is no question of the goodness of the material properly selected, but I can not understand the proposition that is made to begin, in order to spare that reservoir, by taking older men; that is, to begin by filling the Army with the less good material for the trenches, less good physically.

Personally, I think 45 is a haphazard age to fix. I think 40 would be a much better age, because, when you pass the line of 40, you get among the men whose sons are in the war. You also get among the men who form the principal part of those persons who are carrying on the work and the industries of the country. It is the men between 40 and 50 who furnish the great mass of the directing classes—the superintendents, the foremen, the heads of business, the managers of manufactures. Of course, there are many much older, but the bulk come between 40 and 50. You are invading a very valuable class and invading them for a small result; about 150,000 men is all they expect to get. They are mature men. If taken into the Army they ought, other things being equal, to have an opportunity for responsible positions where their one advantage, which is their maturity, would count most. But there has been no chance for those men. They have not been allowed in the camps. They are not allowed to enlist even, and they have had no opportunity to take men between 40 and 45 or between 40 and 50. To put them in as trench troops is putting in men who, on the average, are physically inferior to the men under 30. There can be no question about that.

This shyness about touching the men under 20 or under 21 arises, I am afraid, from a feeling which has stood in the way of all our war measures more or less; and I apply what I am now to say to the administration and to Congress alike. We must remember that our object in all this legislation is getting victories and not getting votes. It is no time to be shy of any measure or any provision, whether in a revenue bill or in a draft bill, because it may be momentarily unpopular and somebody thinks votes may be lost by it.

They misconceive, in my opinion, the feeling of the Americans when they become timid on account of votes. Leave votes alone and do what is right for the country at this time. Now, the real thing above all other things that is right is to get the greatest possible number of men and transport them to France with the utmost speed. If we begin with the older men, who are small in number, and spare the younger men, where we can get our great force, and fail to comb those now exempt in essential industries, we delay the war, and delaying the war means increase in deaths and losses on the front.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Has the Senator seen in the newspapers that Germany is now drawing on the 1920 class?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have seen that statement.

Mr. LODGE. I think all the nations abroad begin at 18 and Germany has gone below it.

Mr. President, nothing could be more inspiriting, nothing could give greater confidence to our allies and to the country than the earnest desire and complete readiness of Congress to pass this new draft bill, for thereby is shown the determination of the Representatives of the people in both branches to put the largest possible number of men in France at the earliest possible moment in order to win a complete victory without delay. The Senate indeed was eager to pass an enlarged draft law last June, and I can not but think that it is to be regretted that the Secretary of War at that time stopped any action by Congress for reasons which have never been made very clear. The opposition of the Secretary being now withdrawn, this bill will quickly pass. Much precious time has been lost, but I have no doubt that every exertion will now be made to carry through the new registration as rapidly as possible. This is a great measure of preparation, and expresses, I am sure, the feeling of the American people in regard to the prosecution of the war. The weight of the United States is already turning the scales which so long have hung in doubtful balance. That weight must be increased in every possible way. A great victory has been won in the Marne salient, in which American troops took a large and most important part. That victory has been continued in the advance of the British, French, and American troops from Amiens. We have every right to rejoice over what has been accomplished. We also have a right to feel the deepest pride in the splendid achievements of the American soldiers. During the great German drive, which began in March, the clouds hung low and dark, but if hopes were dimmed our faith in the ultimate result, I believe, never wavered. An undue pessimism then would have been harmful in a high degree, and an uncalculating optimism now would be almost equally mistaken. Great victories have been won. The reasons for those victories I believe to be two—the appearance of American troops in large numbers on the fighting line and the unity of command. From nothing have the allies suffered so much as from the lack of unity of command, and our administration is entitled to high praise for having cordially joined in putting all the armies on the western front under the command of Marshal Foch. In military operations nothing can be worse than divided counsels and independent commands, even if each commander is a man of the highest ability. For military success there must be one man and one mind to make the final decision. That has been a great element of strength to the Germans. The fact of this unity of command which we and our allies have at last attained has been felt from one end of the western front to the other. The other reason for success was the appearance, as I have said, of the American troops in the fighting line. It was not to be found in their numbers alone, although those were large and of the highest importance; it was in their quality. Our soldiers had necessarily but little experience in the long and bitter defensive warfare carried on by the allies for the last four years, but they brought something quite as important, as vital even as that experience. They were picked men of the finest physical and mental quality, never war-worn nor weary. They had not suffered from the miseries of hope deferred, from the discouragement which follows great deeds that bring no final result. Their spirit was at its highest. In one word, they were the best shock troops in Europe, for the shock troops of England and France and Italy, of Germany and Austria, had all been much more than decimated and had lost to a degree the freshness of the first keen impulse. I can imagine the glow of satisfaction with which Marshal Foch put his new soldiers to the touch. In that supreme test he found that he had a weapon which combined the crushing power of the sword of Richard with the keenness of the scimitar of Saladin and which had the perfect temper of both. He must have rejoiced mightily when he saw these American troops fling themselves upon the Germans and in many cases drive before them in headlong rout that famous infantry. Imagination, as Napoleon said, plays a great part in war, and the presence of these new and gallant troops from the United States and the consciousness that thousands more were coming must have infused fresh spirit throughout the long line of fighting men and renewed the vigor and confidence of our brave and sorely tried allies. But we must not misconceive the character of the victory, great as it has been, and the determination exhibited by the passage of this bill shows that we do not misconceive it. It was a victory of defense. It was a "victory of arrest," as it is well defined by Mr. Frank Simonds in an admirable article which appeared on the 11th of August. The offensive has apparently passed into our hands, but the victory of attack, although begun, is still to be won. We shall win it, but it will be no easy task, and I am sure that the American people mean to carry it through to the bitter end and to an entire completeness. It therefore is of importance that we should have in our minds a clear definition of what that completeness and that end must be. We must face facts and strive for a complete veracity of mind. We must know just what we mean to do, for knowing what we mean to do is half the battle.

The Germans, repulsed and losing, will undoubtedly resort to their other weapon, which they have used more than once during this war with terrible effect. They will begin an insidious and poisonous peace propaganda. With this weapon they have succeeded in disorganizing Russia, reducing that great country to a wreck, and removing it for the time being as a military factor. With the same weapon they brought about the Italian defeat on the Isonzo, which was the result of treachery and disintegrating propaganda and not of straight fighting, because the Italians, when unbetrayed, have shown since then at the Piave the finest fighting qualities and have thrown Austria back in crushing defeat. It is the German propaganda which we shall be obliged to face in the ensuing months, and it therefore seems to me of the last importance to know exactly what we mean by peace. Generalities will not serve. It must be, it is commonly said—we have all said it—a just and righteous peace. But what is a just and righteous peace? What are the conditions that would make it so? What is the irreducible minimum? We intend to make the world safe for democracy. But what exactly do we mean by democracy? If we mean, as we undoubtedly do, the democracy of England, France, Italy, and the United States, we can all understand it; but the Bolsheviki masquerade under the name of democracy, and the Bolsheviki, by a combination of treachery, corruption, and ignorance, have reduced Russia to servitude under Germany and have engendered a form of democracy as dangerous to the world as the government of the Hohenzollerns. But assuming, as we do, when we say we must make the world safe for democracy that we mean our own conception of democracy, how is it to be made safe? That, again, is a vague term which must be answered, and can only be answered by definition. We are fighting and our allies are fighting with us for security; for independence; for the right of nations, great and small, to govern themselves in their own way; for organized races and peoples to have the opportunity to govern themselves in independent States; for the sanctity and observance of treaties; for the general disarmament of nations. How are these things to be secured? The details are really far more important than the general propositions, in which we all agree. Broadly speaking, there is only one way to obtain this security of the nations, this safety of democracy, this preservation of freedom and civilization, and that is by reducing Germany to a condition where by no possibility can she precipitate another war for universal conquest, with all its attendant horrors, upon an unoffending world. Again we are faced by details. How is this to be done? I see only one way in which it can be done, and I will enumerate the results, the hard facts, the essential conditions to which we must attain.

Belgium must be restored.

Alsace and Lorraine must be returned to France—unconditionally returned—not merely because sentiment and eternal justice demand it, but because the iron and coal of Lorraine must be forever taken from Germany.

Italia Irredenta—all those areas where the Italian race is predominant, including Trieste—must go back to Italy.

Serbia and Roumania must be established in their independence.

Greece must be made secure.

Most important of all, if we are to make the world safe in the way we mean it to be safe, the great Slav populations now under the Government of Austria—the Jugo-Slavs and the Czecho-Slovaks, who have been used to aid the Germans, whom they loathe—must be established as independent States.

The Polish people must have an independent Poland.

And we must have these independent States created so that they will stand across the pathway of Germany to the East. Nothing is more vital than this for a just, a righteous, and an enduring peace.

The Russian Provinces taken from Russia by the villainous peace of Brest-Litovsk must be restored to Russia. The President, as you all remember, has announced the vast importance of sustaining Russia. If Germany continues to hold a large part of Russia, the world for years to come will be under the shadow of another great war which will surely be precipitated upon us when Germany has developed her Russian possessions to the point of yielding her men, money, and supplies.

Constantinople must be finally taken away from Turkey and placed in the hands of the allied nations as a free port, so as to bar Germany's way to the East and hold the Dardanelles open for the benefit of mankind.

We must not be beguiled into concessions to Turkey, with whom we ought now to be at war, in the hope of separating her from Germany. It would be a miserable outcome to have Turkey retained in Europe, a curse to her subjects and neighbors, a plague spot, and a breeder of wars. Her massacres must not under any pretense be condoned nor her iniquities rewarded. Let Turkey and Bulgaria share the fate of their master and be so treated that they will be unable again to trouble the world.

Palestine must never return to Turkish rule, and the persecuted Christians of Asia Minor—the Syrians and the Armenians—must be made safe.

There must be compensation. For the lives of women and children and helpless old men no compensation can ever be obtained. But the things, including pictures, books, and works of art, which the Germans have stolen can be restored and there can be money compensation exacted for the tribute money wrung from helpless towns and cities under the German lash. There must be compensation to Belgium and a partial compensation at least can be found in the disposition of the German colonies, which ought never to be returned to the Empire which has so abused all the most ordinary rights of humanity.

These in outline are the principal conditions which alone will give us a victory worth having, and when we talk about a complete peace and a just and righteous peace, let it be known to all the world that this is what we mean. It is idle to talk about our annihilating the German people. Nobody, of course, has any such idea. It could not be done even if we wished to do it.

We are not engaged in this war to try to arrange a government for Germany. The German people must do that themselves, and they will get precisely the government which they desire and deserve—just as they now have the government they prefer, whose purposes and ambitions and barbarism they share and sustain. Our part and our business is to put Germany in a position where she can do no more harm in the future to the rest of the world. Unless we achieve this we shall have fought in vain. Congress and the President had no right to declare war unless they meant to do precisely this thing. Nothing less would justify our action. We are pouring out the best blood of the country, the blood of our chosen youth, upon the altar of patriotism. We are making every sort of pecuniary sacrifice. We are bearing an immense burden of taxation. We are mortgaging with our loans the future of coming generations. We have set aside for the time being the Constitution under which individual liberty has been preserved and the country has grown and prospered. We have adopted measures which lead, if unchecked, to the building up on the one hand of a great bureaucracy such as that which crushed and ruined Russia and which on the other are stimulating the development of state socialism. It is our intention to return, as our laws show, to the old restrictions, protections, and rights of the ordered freedom of the Constitution. We are taking these vast risks, we are bearing these huge burdens, we are making these unspeakable sacrifices of life with a brave and cheerful spirit; but we have no right to do all these things unless we win the prize and reach the goal which alone can warrant and justify them. The results which we must have, and which I have ventured to outline, can never be obtained by a negotiated peace. Lord Lansdowne—and he is not alone—appears to think that this war can be ended by a peace formulated by eminent representatives of the nations in the old way. He does not seem to have gone beyond the methods of 1815 and the Congress of Vienna. As this war is utterly different from any war that the world has ever known, so must the peace which concludes it be utterly different from any peace which the world has ever known. It can not be a peace of bargain, of give and take, and of arrangement. It can not be a peace which rests on signed treaties alone, for no treaty is worth the paper it is written on when made with Germany, whom no agreement binds, to whom no signature has meaning, and whose pledges are as false as dicers' oaths. The only peace for us is one that rests on hard physical facts, the peace of unconditional surrender. No peace that satisfies Germany in any degree can ever satisfy us. It can not be a negotiated peace. It must be a dictated peace, and we and our allies must dictate it. The victory bringing such a peace must be won inside, not outside, the German frontier. It must be won finally and thoroughly in German territory, and can be so won nowhere else.

In no other way can we secure the safety for which we are fighting. In no other way can we justify the sacrifices we are making. To this supreme end our efforts must be addressed. I do not underrate the difficulties. I do not underestimate the obstacles to be overcome. But the difficulties and the obstacles must alike be crushed, set aside, and overridden. The United States occupies, fortunately, a position in which she will be able to speak with a powerful voice. We seek no territory, no material gain for our own country. We seek only the safety of civilization and freedom and the assurance of our own absolute independence and our right to live our own lives and settle our own problems in our own way. There is no territory by which we could be bribed or influenced, no trade advantage by which we could be tempted. There is no personal profit which can turn us from the one great object. Our sole purpose is to put Germany finally and completely in a position where she can never again attempt to conquer and ruin the world as she has done in the last four years. Complete and utter victory is all we Americans can gain from the war, and that victory we must have. In one word, we must go to Berlin and there dictate peace. This purpose can be accomplished. We shall do it, but we must be above all propositions of a bargained peace, all suggestions of negotiations; deaf to every voice which would divert us from the path; deaf alike to the whimper of the pacifist and to the wheedling or truculent appeal of the helpers of Germany. When Germany is beaten to her knees and the world is made safe by the arrangements which I have suggested, then, and not before, we shall have the just and righteous peace for which we fight. In this way and in no other shall we obtain it. We shall obtain it because we are going to win. Let us but be true to ourselves, and we shall not then be false to any man.

I ask permission, Mr. President, to print the accompanying article as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

APPENDIX.

LAST PHASE OF THIRD GERMAN EFFORT OF GREAT WAR.

[By Frank H. Simonds.]

[Copyright, 1918, Tribune Association, the New York Tribune.]

Germany has lost the campaign of 1918, and with this loss has been joined the inevitable extinction of the last chance to win a military victory, provided only that the great nations now in arms against the German and his minor allies remain as firmly united as they have been in the past. Germany escaped a defeat which was plainly indicated after the close of the campaign of 1916, despite her Roumanian victories of that year, solely because Russia abandoned the struggle and thus freed German hands. In 1917 the Russian debacle enabled Germany to defeat British and French offensives, and in 1918 to undertake her own great offensive, which has just been wrecked at the Marne.

If one could conceive that, following the Russian precedent, Germany could hereafter eliminate Britain, France, the United States, or Italy from the war, she might be able to undertake a new offensive to win a military decision in the west with a reasonable prospect of victory, but apart from such a success she has no longer the numbers or the resources necessary for the task.

We have had in this war three phases, which have been exactly alike and have held to the same results. In August and September, 1914, Germany undertook to eliminate France from the war by her great offensive. Her strategy was based upon the theory that before Russia could intervene effectively either in east Prussia or against Austria, the German Army could dispose of France and thereafter turn its attention to the reduction of Russia. The failure of the Marne entailed the decisive defeat of this strategy. The German Army proved inadequate for its mighty task and French military power endured.

Again, at Verdun, having beaten Russia down and while Britain was still unready, Germany endeavored to dispose of France. The problem was the same, the issues identical, and, in this case, it was Britain who played the rôle of Russia in 1914 and at the Somme began an offensive which deprived Germany of all chance of realizing her Verdun purposes. For a second time the western line held and Germany was thrown back upon the defensive.

We are just seeing the last phase of the third German effort. The revolution in Russia, carefully guided by German agencies, had at last disposed of Russia in 1917. The United States could not effectively intervene in the first half of the campaign of 1918. Ludendorff had nearly six months ahead of him, as he calculated, more than six months as it then seemed, in which to dispose of Britain and France before Pershing's army could turn the scales. And, as in 1914, in the Marne campaign, and in 1916, before Verdun, the Germans have come within an ace of success and have failed, only after brilliant preliminary triumphs.

REPETITION OF WATERLOO EVENTS.

But again there has been a repetition of the Waterloo circumstances. The German Napoleon has sought three times to overwhelm the allied Wellington, Joffre, Petain, and Foch, in turn, but each time Blucher has arrived in time, the Russians in 1914, the British in 1916, and ourselves in 1918. As a result, each grandiose attempt has failed at the moment when the German people and the German soldiers have not too rashly believed that victory was within plain sight.

Now, going back to the former occasions, we see that the failure in the Marne campaign was followed by a transfer of German effort for nearly a year and a half to the east front. Germany could not fight offensive campaigns on both sides, so she abandoned the west to settle matters in the east. When she came back to the west, in the Verdun campaign, she was too late. Britain was almost ready and France able to hold until Britain could begin. After the Verdun failure it was necessary to go east and south again, Russia having once more become dangerous and Roumania a fresh foe.

But Russia, definitely destroyed for military purposes, Roumania disposed of, the east at her feet, Germany came west again this spring. America was as unready, far more unready than Britain in the Verdun time. The chance to dispose of the older enemies before the new one was on the field in troublesome numbers was unmistakable. The battles of Picardy, Flanders, and the Aisne seemed to promise the ultimate victory just as Morhange, Charleroi, and Mons seemed to promise it in 1914. The most optimistic allied observer could not deny that Germany had a fresh opportunity to gain a decision on the continental battle field the moment it was disclosed that the Germans had devised a system of battle tactics which abolished the value of trench systems, as their heavy guns had abolished the value of forts nearly four years before. The parallel was again striking, but fortunately the end was the same.

Now, it is one thing to say that Germany has lost the chance to win a military decision in this war and another to say she has lost the war. Still a third statement is the declaration that we, the nations which are allied against Germany, have won the struggle. This last is emphatically not the case. Nor is it true that Germany has lost the war. She has lost the chance of winning it on the battle field; she has other methods, and they are bound to be used now to the uttermost.

Germany was beaten in 1916 at the close of the campaign of that year, and she knew it. Accordingly, the Kaiser proposed peace, not because he desired peace, not because his proposal was intended to be the basis of a settlement on an honorable and possible basis, but because he reckoned that a proposal of peace might disarm his foes and accomplish what his armies had failed to bring about, namely, a real German victory. His calculations were amazingly correct. His peace proposals threw his foes into confusion, ultimately led to Russia's collapse, temporarily brought Italy to the point of seeming impotence, and enabled the German army to enter the campaign of 1918 with a new chance to acquire a military decision.

NEW PROPOSAL OF PEACE PREDICTED.

Beyond all doubt the Kaiser will now repeat his strategy of 1916 and we shall have a new proposal of peace within a brief time, probably the moment that some considerable but relatively unimportant German success, such as still remains possible, tends to give a temporary lie to the facts in the German military situation in the west. There will then be a frank declaration, such a declaration as Kuehlmann made the other day, that no military decision is possible. Both sides have made the try; both sides have made at least three tremendous failures; therefore, the Germans will reason, a military decision is impossible and peace by negotiation is the only way out of a situation which is bringing about the bankruptcy of civilization.

When this situation develops it is essential for every allied observer to remember that Paris is once more in danger, for the German will be seeking by the most ingenious and sustained effort to win the French Nation into making a separate peace, a peace which will be as attractive, in German propaganda, as that "peace without indemnities or annexations" which lured Russia to ruin at Brest-Litovsk. Not less appealing bait will be held out to Italy, like France invaded and far more than France exposed to internal dangers of a disruptive sort.

Germany means to win the war by her peace offensive, now that her war offensive has failed. The element of time is just as much against her in the new operation as in the old. Turkey and Bulgaria are becoming restive; Austria is on the edge of revolution—to be sure, like a donkey on a mountain trail, Austrian statesmen seem always to select the outer and dangerous edge; but the present situation is more critical than any that has preceded. If German peace operations were delayed over a long period, Turkey and Bulgaria might escape the German leading strings and make a separate peace with the enemy. Even Austria might break under the strain.

We shall have next winter, therefore, to repel the peace offensive designed to enable Germany to keep a respectable, a larger share of the Provinces she has conquered. We shall have the peace offensive supplemented by much military threatening. Unquestionably the promise to devastate all of France still in German hands, as well as Belgium, in the fashion Picardy was devastated in the Hindenburg retreat, will be one gentle German hint to France as to the advisability of coming to an arrangement. And until that peace offensive is defeated we must face the fact that we may still lose the war.

ONE MORE YEAR OF HARD FIGHTING.

But if the peace offensive fails, as the war offensive has unmistakably failed, there is still ahead of us at least one year more of terrific and costly fighting before we can begin to hope to win the war in the only way that it can be won—namely, upon the battle field. And in that time each temporary reverse, each check, each delay, will serve the Germans as a new basis for their peace offensive and a new foundation for their argument that no military decision is possible. Of the three stages that have to be covered before we come to the point where real peace is possible, we have but passed the first, or are just coming to the end of it. It has been in a sense the most critical of all, but it has also been the simplest, because in the face of a peril which no man could misunderstand all effort and all energy were concentrated naturally upon the task of stopping the enemy. It will be less easy to get the same concentration in the other two stages.

If one could only make it clear for the balance of the war to all publics, American and allied alike, that the German uses peace and war operations in just the same way and for the same end. If he can't conquer a foe and impose his will upon an enemy by his army and by battle, he tries a peace proposal. Whether the attack be by arms or words, the purpose of the attack is to gain or retain Provinces and plunder. Russia was conquered by German peace operations quite as much as by her military attacks. The Italian defeat at the Isonzo was procured by peace machinations before it was obtained by military attack.

The German knows quite well that if the war goes to a military decision he will not only lose all that he has taken in his various campaigns, but also that Germany will suffer as much as in the Thirty Years War. German rulers know that the defeat of the German Army will inevitably involve changes within Germany which are, to say the least, unpromising. No one expects a great moral awakening in Germany. What is to be expected is that the German, who was willing to support the existing system because of its supposed efficiency and fancied profits, will look for a new system when the profits are found to be nonexistent.

CHANGED MIND AFTER RUSSIAN COLLAPSE.

Therefore the German leadership is not going to risk the decision upon the battle field, which must be against it, if it can find any way to keep the provinces and the plunder without running the ultimate risk. This can only be accomplished by a peace propaganda which turns on the war weariness and feeling of exhaustion of the peoples fighting. We have all of us had full and sufficient evidence of the many phases of the defeatist campaign of 1917, following the German peace proposal of December, 1916, and the Reichstag resolution of the following summer.

In 1916 and for a fraction of 1917 the German was convinced that he could not get a military decision. He changed his mind after the Russian collapse. In other words, his peace offensive was so successful that it cleared the way for a new venture of the German high command, a new try for the military decision. The result of this effort is becoming plainer every day. The decision was not and is not to be had: therefore, the German will unquestionably go back now to the other form of warfare, which he calls peace propaganda and we call a peace offensive.

Turning now to the military phase again. The German can not get a military decision because he no longer has the numbers to enforce any local decision. He no longer has any advantage in gross numbers. With the American troops actually in France the allies outnumber him greatly; but, unfortunately, only a portion of the Americans are now available. But there are enough of these, as I showed several weeks ago in a Sunday article, to give Foch something more than an equality of numbers and leave the German only such advantages as come from the greater homogeneity of his force, since it is all of one nationality, and the superiority of training, with respect only, however, to our own troops.

Since I made my statement the proof has been supplied by the Foch offensive. Employing the larger part of the American divisions which have been long in France and his own French colonial troops, Foch created an army of maneuver and struck the German flank between the Marne and the Aisne, bringing off one of the great strategic triumphs of the war. Had Foch been able to dispose of sufficient reserves the stroke might have been far more effective, just as Joffre's victory at the Marne would have led to far more decisive results had Joffre possessed any large unexhausted reserve.

But neither Foch nor Ludendorff has such a reserve now. Ludendorff had it in the beginning of the campaign and lost it in the terrible struggles which have since ensued. Foch is acquiring it as our American troops become available in larger and larger numbers, but will probably not have it in sufficient strength to enable him to go beyond the limits of counter offensives like his recent stroke this year. This is not to say that Ludendorff may not deal a happier blow, viewed from the German angle, than his last two, one of which was checked, the other turned into a heavy defeat. The point is that he will be unable after such a stroke to enforce a decision.

MOST BRILLIANT OF HIS CAMPAIGNS.

Napoleon was in the same situation in the most brilliant of all his campaigns, also fought in the Marne Valley. Bernhardi comments significantly upon this fact in one of his military works. The German has very nearly exhausted his shock troops; he is facing an enemy who is his equal in numbers, has at least as good communications on the vital French sectors of the front, and is now in a position to meet any offensive, employing therein fresh American troops.

The value of our troops in the situation is peculiar. They are not, on the whole, the match for any other troops in the European field on the defensive, because they lack the four years of training of French, German, and British troops. But on the offensive and under the guidance of the French staff they possess exactly the qualities which make them the most dangerous shock troops in Europe. They are young, physically fit, and morally at the highest point soldiers can attain. Their spirits have not been weakened by four years of suffering; they have not slowed down under the strain which has taken the edge off the best of all the other nations' forces.

As a striking force Foch, then, has found at his hand in Pershing's army the best conceivable weapon. He has, moreover, the certainty of a rapidly increasing number of these troops. Three hundred thousand arrive in Europe each month, and it will not be long before his monthly increase in trained troops will reach this figure. In less than two months the American contribution is more than the annual increment Germany gets from one of her classes, and it is made up of infinitely better material.

We shall have next year practically the only army in Europe capable of making an offensive in the spirit and with the force which German armies revealed at the Marne and Verdun, which the French armies displayed in many offensives before the fatal failure of the Aisne last year, which the British armies preserved through the Somme and the Flanders campaign of last year. It will be an incomparable weapon in Foch's hands, this American Army, with all its determination, spirit, and energy. And some fraction of it, an ever increasing fraction, will play a part this year. Indeed, if there is a tendency in certain quarters to exaggerate the technical military value of our contribution at the recent battle test, the value of the moral contribution can not be exaggerated.

We ought to have more than 2,000,000 fighting men in France next year, and we ought to have reserves to keep our Army at that strength. With such an army as the striking force of the allied offensive, it does not seem to me that there is any reason to doubt that by the end of the campaign, even though we are not in Berlin or across the Rhine, the outcome of the war will be so clearly forecast that the Germans will be unable to make a peace offensive which can be dangerous, for once our military victory is foreshadowed German victory by peace offensives will become as impossible as German victory by military means is now becoming.

OVER THE PITCH FOR THE PRESENT YEAR.

Meantime we are over the pitch for the present year, and for the war, unless the German can escape again, as he did two years ago, when he started his peace campaign and thereby destroyed Russia and ruined the Italian offensive against Austria. While Italy holds Austria, with a measure of help from the allies, France, Britain, and the United States can defeat Germany next year, as they should now be able to check the remaining German thrusts this year. Unity of commands, unity of faith, and unity of policy carry with them the death sentence for the German purposes if they can be preserved through the next winter.

It is idle to imagine that the German Army is not capable of great resistance in the future. The recent retreat has been conducted in a manner beyond praise. The German high command made an appalling blunder and a grotesque miscalculation. Had the German Army been any less determined and disciplined this blunder might have led to destruction, at least for the army immediately involved. But, so far from leading to this, the defeat simply opened the way for an orderly and well-conducted withdrawal in which the resistance of the retreating foe won the recognition of the victors. Even if the German does not fight fairly or cleanly, even though his methods are abhorrent, there is general testimony to the stubbornness with which his rear guards hung on to position after position, although the great battle was lost and there could be no disguising the fact.

WILL SEEK SOME SORT OF VICTORY.

Nothing is more likely than that the Germans will attempt to close the present campaign with some sort of victory. A decisive victory is beyond the possibilities. But he may take some sector of famous ground, some city like Nancy, or even Ypres, by paying a price, and then point to this achievement as proof that he has won the campaign and remains invincible. In 1915 the Germans used their autumn successes in Serbia to cover failures in the west and the larger failure in the east, where Russia managed to escape destruction for the moment. In 1916 Roumania played the same part for the Germans, who had been defeated at Verdun and the Somme. Last year the Russian collapse was too plain to require from the Germans any such effort.

The way to a successful peace offensive for the Germans plainly begins at some local military triumph on the west front which shall, in part, restore the prestige of the recently defeated Crown Prince and the discomfited Ludendorff. To get this victory a new blow will be needed, and there is, therefore, every reason to forecast at least one more considerable German offensive, followed by a desperate effort both to exploit such success as is achieved on the battle field and celebrate it all over the world.

We shall have to be on our guard, therefore, both in the matter of pessimism and of optimism. At the present moment there is a dangerous degree of optimism afloat. The reaction from the depression of recent months is natural and proper, but it should not lead to exaggerated hopes. We have blocked the enemy, and we have defeated him in the crucial battle of this campaign. But the most that was possible for us this year was to prevent the Germans from winning the European phase of the war on the battle field; it will take one or two more years for us to win it by our own efforts. The second Marne was like the first, a great and successful battle of arrest; but nations are not conquered by battles of arrest—such battles merely save the nation or nations attacked. There remains the larger task of beating the enemy, and he remains, despite his recent reverse, still unbeaten in the larger sense.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have listened with very great interest to the speech of the learned Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. So far as the objects and purposes of this war are concerned I am in hearty accord with everything he has said. I must take exception, however, to one statement which he made, or perhaps it is only the inference which might be drawn from his statement, to the effect that those Senators who vote against 18-year limitation will be perhaps considering it from the standpoint of votes.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio will allow me, I beg to say that I did not mean to imply anything of the kind. My own impression was against lowering the draft age to 18 years at the beginning, but I think the time has come when we must do it.

Mr. POMERENE. I am very glad to have that explanation.

Mr. LODGE. I certainly would not make any insinuation of that sort as to any Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I feel quite sure that the Senator did not intend to do so.

Mr. President, the most solemn, the most serious, and at the same time the most satisfactory act of my life was when I voted in favor of the joint resolution declaring a state of war against Germany. In that resolution we pledged all our men and all our resources to the accomplishment of the end we had in view, and, if it is necessary at any time to vote to take the 18-year-old boy or even the 17-year-old boy to accomplish that object, I shall vote for it. My thought is that this war shall be prosecuted until there is an unconditional surrender of Prussianism; but when Senators come in here and speak as if ex cathedra and declare that it is now necessary to take 18-year-old boys, I must take issue with them.

It may be interesting for Senators to bear in mind what the draft age was during the Civil War, and surely conditions as they confronted the country at that time were indeed serious. I realize the fact that most of the boys who went to the front were 18 and 19, and I may say I think in truth that if more of the boys who were older had performed their part it would have been less necessary for the boys of 18 and 19 to shoulder arms.

But the Congress which had charge of the legislation at that time provided that the draft age should be 20. The Twelfth United States Statutes at Large, page 731, first section, reads:

That all able-bodied male citizens of the United States, and persons of foreign birth who shall have declared on oath their intention to become citizens under and in pursuance of the laws thereof, between the ages of 20 and 45 years of age, except as hereinafter excepted, are hereby declared to constitute the national forces, and shall be liable to perform military duty in the service of the United States when called out by the President for that purpose.

There was an act supplementary to this passed in 1864. I read from the Thirteenth United States Statutes at Large, page 7:

That boards of enrollment shall enroll all persons liable to draft under the provisions of this act, and the act to which this is an amendment, whose names may have been omitted by the proper enrolling officers; all persons who shall arrive at the age of 20 years before the draft; all aliens who shall declare their intentions to become citizens—

And so forth.

Mr. President, it seems as though, while the majority of the boys who were at the front in the Civil War were 18 and 19, the Congress in its wisdom only required those to go who were 20 years of age and upwards.

Gen. March, the Chief of Staff, appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs during the early part of this month and testified, on page 24 of the hearings:

I believe when we get together our Army as one composite American Army under our own commanding general, occupying our own sector instead of having the troops distributed along the line, that 2,000,000 combatant Americans can do anything over there.

And on page 38 of the hearings he said:

My personal belief is that with an American Army of 4,000,000 men in France under one commander in chief we can go through that German line wherever we please.

And the headlines in this morning's paper confirm his statement, because they say that to-day, along a front of 31 miles, the enemy are in full retreat.

Mr. President, in considering our military status, the Army experts made the statement that the necessary forces required were 98 divisions—80 along the battle line and 18 in camps in this country, 98 in all—with 40,000 men to a division. All told they amount to 3,920,000 men—80,000 short of the 4,000,000 men which seems to be the special number usually named. If we take the figures which are submitted by these experts, I think it will appear very clearly that it is unnecessary to take the boys of 18.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I understood the Senator correctly, he just made the statement that there were 40,000 men in a division. Is that correct?

Mr. POMERENE. Forty thousand was the statement made by the Chief of Staff.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have always understood that an American division consisted of about 28,000, and it is something of a surprise to me to learn that it is 40,000. Evidently there has been a change quite recently.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota, as I recall the fact, is correct as the division was understood to be some months ago. Later it was said that it would amount to about 37,000, and when the testimony was given before the committee they fixed the number at 40,000; and I am accepting that number for the purposes of the observations I may have to make.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, it is understood that that includes all the noncombatants.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, I assume so.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. WOLCOTT. A division must consist of more than 40,000 men, because, if the Senator will note, on page 24 of the hearings Gen. March testified as follows:

Roughly, 40,000 men to a division. Of couse, there are the corps troops and the Army troops in addition to that, which brings the whole number up to about 4,800,000 men.

Mr. POMERENE. I know that general statement has been made, and I may make some reference to it a little later if I do not overlook it.

Mr. President, in the first registration there were 9,586,508 men registered. In the second registration there were 784,000 men registered. That included only those men who became of age after June 5, 1917, and it is estimated by the War Department that if this bill should become a law, fixing the age limits at 18 and 45, there would be a total new registration of between thirteen and fourteen million. Taking the lower estimate, it would make a total of 23,370,508 men between 18 and 45 years of age. We have at the present time in Europe about 1,500,000 men; we have in the camps to-day 1,500,000 men—in round numbers, a total of three millions of men. These three millions of men are taken out of the class of registrants between the ages of 21 and 31, save and except those who volunteered. There are between six and seven millions of men among those who registered the first time and who are in the deferred classes—classes 2, 3, 4, and 5. These classes include all married men—men, it may be, who have wives but no children—men who ought to be at the front serving their country instead of depending npon the 18-year-old boys to take their places. And, lest I forget it, let me observe here that none of these men are exempted by act of Congress. It is true the power has been given by the Congress to the President to provide for classification and to defer certain classes, but what has been done in that behalf has been done by the War Department alone. It is their judgment, not ours. It is not the country's judgment.

Mr. President, I have even received a number of letters from the draft officials in my own State, and no later than this morning a letter from one of these draft boards suggesting a reclassification of these registrants, because they say there are many of these young men who at the outbreak of our trouble with Mexico and when it was thought that there might be a draft to take the boys there married in anticipation of possible trouble.

Now, Mr. President, let us see the present condition of these lists of registered men. We have 3,000,000 in the service. According to the hearings before the Military Affairs Committee it was uncertain as to how many men remained in class 1, but after the War Department has revised its figures we find that on August 1, 1918, there were still 550,000 men in class 1.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Five hundred and eighty thousand.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator to repeat that statement?

Mr. POMERENE. I made the statement that there were 550,000 men in class 1 still remaining uncalled. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] corrects me, and makes the statement that there are 580,000; and I think that figure appears in the hearings, as I now recall.

Mr. WOLCOTT. On page 35.

Mr. POMERENE. On page 35. They are calling these men at the rate of 250,000 a month. Let us assume, for the sake of the argument, that the 250,000 quota for the month of August has been called and are in camp. I do not know whether they are or not. There still remain 330,000 men in class 1, out of which we can get the quota of 250,000 for September, and that will leave about 80,000 still remaining for the October call. More than that, during the last registration there were 784,000 men who had become of age since June 5, 1917.

Now, I am not prepared to say whether the 250,000 quota for the month of August was included in the department's estimate of a million and a half men in the camps in this country or not; but wipe that out. We have, then, 330,000 in class 1 without any reclassification; and let me remind Senators that when this classification was made by the War Department it was not the understanding of the boys who were to be drafted that those who were put in deferred classes would be exempted from service. They were simply deferred; and I dare say that every Senator here knows of young men of his own acquaintance who have said, "I am in the deferred class, and I expect to be called, and I am going to go when called." Now, the War Department, instead of treating classes 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 as if they were deferred classes, by this legislation in fact is treating them as if they were exempted classes, and are calling upon the boys of 18, 19, and 20 to go to the front.

Senators, we have, according to the statement I have made, 330,000. Assuming that the number of men desired in Europe is 4,000,000, with 3,000,000 in the service, that leaves us only 1,000,000 men to provide; and we have 330,000 in class 1 now. That leaves, then, 670,000 other troops to be provided for, and they can be provided by a reclassification. Why, the most of these men who have been put in the deferred classes will resent the thought that they are to be arbitrarily kept at home.

Let us examine these figures a little further. There is a very interesting statement submitted in the report of the Military Affairs Committee, an estimate made by the Provost Marshal General, on pages 6, 7, 8, and 9. He estimates that if this bill becomes a law there will be, between the ages of 32 and 45, 601,236 men. We only have 670,000 to provide. We get 601,000—in round numbers, 600,000—from this class of new registrants, and that leaves us, then, 70,000 men to provide.

Now, note further: In the classes 18 to 20 they estimate that there will be 1,797,609. A rough estimate contained in the hearings before the committee will show to you that in the judgment of the War Department there would be 550,000 men of the age of 20, 550,000 of the age of 19, and 600,000 of the age of 18, so that if we go to the class of 20 for our 70,000 we can find them there and still have 480,000 in the 20-year class; and yet they come and want the 18 and 19 year old boys.

Mr. President, I am very glad to say—and I do it with all credit to the boys of 18 and 19—that if left to their vote as to whether they should go to the front or not, the vast majority of them—nearly all of them—would vote to go. Thank God for that spirit.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the very great liberality which the department exercises when it comes to the exemptions from military service. Let us take the study on page 8 of the report of the committee on the pending bill.

There are of the ages 32 to 45, 601,236; of the ages 19 to 20, inclusive, 1,121,634; in all, 1,722,870. Now, when it comes to a determination as to the number that we shall get out of the class age 32 to 40, I want Senators to note how extremely liberal they are in allowing exemptions. The total males are estimated at 10,028,973. They deduct first married men deferred—that means deferring that class of married men who perhaps have fortunes, the pampered sons of fortune, and who are hiding behind their wives' petticoats; they are to be exempted under this regulation—less deferred solely for industry and agriculture, 401,159; less other deferments, 200,579; less delinquents, 300,869; making a total by that one sweep of the pen of 8,637,089 who are deferred, leaving a remainder of 1,391,884.

But they are still not through with their exemptions. They go further and they deduct "less enlistments," 170,000; less aliens, 125,270; less Emergency Fleet, 60,000; total, 355,270; leaving a remainder again of 1,036,614. Then they deduct "physical rejects," 435,378, and that leaves a net total of 601,236 for military service out of 10,028,973 between the ages of 32 and 45. They take 1 out of 16, or thereabouts.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if these figures as to the married men cover all married men or only those with dependents?

Mr. POMERENE. I regret that I am not able to definitely answer. I have taken the figures as they are given here. Of course, some of the married men have volunteered. Some of the married men are put in class 1, some in class 2, some in class 3, and, if my memory serves me correctly, some in class 4.

By the way, lest I forget it, I ask that there may be appended to my remarks the classification provided for in the pamphlet marked Selective Service Regulations, page 136.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In this connection——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In response to the question of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] I desire to say that in the New York papers of the 10th instant there appeared what purported to be a statement by the Secretary of War that marriage per se would exempt men automatically from the draft.

Mr. POMERENE. Would or would not, did I understand?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That it would automatically exempt men from the draft. It surprised me, because I thought it was the reverse of the policy which had been adopted. As soon as my attention was called to it I addressed the Secretary of War a letter, and if the Senator would care to have me read the letter, which is short, I will read it and his reply.

Mr. POMERENE. If it is short, I would be very glad to have it read.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask the Secretary to read those two letters. They answer the question of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. POMERENE. I will be glad to hear them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

AUGUST 16, 1918.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In the New York papers of last Saturday, if I mistake not, you were quoted as saying, in substance, that "under the new man-power act and regulations thereunder, as you would promulgate them, there would be no husbands in class 1."

As I have watched the evolution and development of the regulations under the former act, if this course now outlined in your interview is followed, it will reverse the whole policy that has heretofore been adopted. Your interview is bringing to my desk hundreds of letters on the subject, and I am advised from different parts of the country that men who would come under the new man-power act are rushing to the matrimonial bureaus, expecting to be relieved from the draft if any such rule as proposed is adopted.

The question is bound to come before the Senate in the discussion of the new bill, and already I have heard at least one Senator say that he would not vote to reduce the age to 18 years if any such rule is to be followed.

May I have an authoritative statement from you upon this subject, so that I may be prepared to answer discussions upon the subject?

I have the honor to remain,
Yours, very sincerely, GEO. E. CHAMBERLAIN.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 16, 1918.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN: I have received your letter of this morning. The present situation with regard to married men in class 1 is that four classes of married men are included within the limits of that class:

1. Married men who do not support their wives or families.
2. Married men whose wives support them.
3. Married men whose wives have adequate independent means.
4. Married men engaged in useless occupations, and who are not the main or principal support of their families.

There is no intention to change this situation.

In construing the regulations with regard to dependency of wives and children, financial dependency has been looked upon as the reason for deferred classification. This will continue to be the case.

I am told that in some parts of the country there is an abnormal increase in the rate of marriages, which suggests the possibility of a desire to use marriage as a basis for a claim for exemption. Marriages so contracted will not have the effect desired. The status of registrants married at a time and under conditions suggesting any such purpose will be that of unmarried persons, so far as their classification is concerned.

Cordially, yours, NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Mr. POMERENE. I may say also that some four or five days ago I wrote to the Provost Marshal General asking him if he could inform me, or give me an estimate, of the number of married men who did not have children, whose wives were prior to marriage either self-supporting or supported by their parents. I have not been favored with a reply, but I assume that the department has been very busy.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. In view of that letter, trying to clear up this point, which it seems to me is very important, will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask the Senator from Oregon if the figures on page 8 of the report, less married men deferred, over 7,000,000, include all married men or only the married men who might be deferred along the line of the Secretary's letter? It would make quite a difference in the reservoir of men to be drawn from.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator, I do not have the report before me just now and I do not know just what those figures are, but I think there is an explanatory footnote which shows just what was intended. I am not sure about it. I imagine, however, that it would be largely dependent on the local board, with reference to the character of married men who would be exempted by the board.

Mr. KENYON. As I understand these figures, they are simply taking out all the married men. If the law is to be interpreted in the light of the Secretary's letter, you would not deduct so many married men, and would have a larger reservoir to draw from.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, all of which goes to prove the necessity of a reclassification of these men.

Mr. KENYON. Exactly.

Mr. POMERENE. And when they are reclassified and they come in here and say to us then that it is necessary to take the 18-year-old boy I will support that measure, but not until I can get more satisfactory information than I have gotten up to date. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order will be maintained in the galleries. No applause is permitted by the rules of the Senate on the part of the occupants of the galleries.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know whether the applause comes from those who are married or about to be married, or from the representatives of the younger element.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, whether it does or not, the observation does not add any enlightenment to the discussion.

Mr. President, there has been a good deal said in reference to the quality of the 18-year-old soldier. I am willing to admit that perhaps the 18-year-old soldier who wants to go will make a better soldier than the one who is 25 and does not want to go; but that is not any reason why we should exempt the 25-year-old man who is married and take the boy who is 18 years old.

Has it occurred to those who are insisting upon the taking of the 18-year-old boys that under the laws of nearly every one, if not every one, of the 48 States a boy can not get married until he is 21 years of age without the consent of his parents? And does it not occur to Senators that it is a little bit strange if the 18 and 19 year old boy made the best soldier that the Congress of the United States during the Civil War cast aside the 18 and 19 year old boy when it came to the preparation of the draft bill and provided that the minimum draft age should be 20?

Oh, Mr. President, when I hear Senators say that the 18 or 19 year old boy is so much better material out of which to make a soldier than the boy who is a few years older I envy that man his mental microscope which permits him to see these things in that way. If we are to refer to the soldier boys of 1860 to 1865, we know that then nearly every American boy in his teens could shoulder his rifle and go out in the forest and pick a squirrel from the top of the highest tree, and except that they needed a few horseshoers and a few tailors and a few cooks that was about all the expert knowledge they needed. But now in this war of science and mechanics, when all the resources, mechanical and scientific, are being mobilized and sent to the front, who will make the better soldier, the boy of 18 who has not had the benefit of a college education or who has not yet served his apprenticeship, if he is seeking a trade, or a boy who is 21 years old and upward who has perhaps finished in part, at least, a college course or may perhaps have served his apprenticeship in his trade and knows the secrets of electric science and motors and all the complicated pieces of machinery that are now needed along the battle front?

Yet we want to take these boys. I am not consulting their wishes. I believe that, looking at it from the standpoint of the boys, I am making the most unpopular speech I have ever made when I say that, in my judgment, they ought to stay at home a little while.

It was only a few months ago that the President of the United States, as I recall from what appeared in the papers, urged all the boys to stay in college until they were called. Why? Because he realized that they needed their training. I am just as much interested in the boy who is learning his trade as in the boy who is preparing for a profession. This war is going to end some day, and when those boys have to go to the front I wish them to have all the preliminary education that they can get before they go, because I know and you know that when the boys come home they will perhaps be marrying or think that their early manhood has been too far spent and they have not the time to take up the preliminary training for a profession or a trade, and they will not get it then.

The Military Affairs Committee must have recognized that they are doing an injustice to these boys when they take them, because they say that when they come back they may be educated at the expense of the Government, those who were under 21 years of age, if they make the request within six months. I appreciate that part of the bill and I shall favor it, because it will give educational advantages to the boys who have volunteered to serve their country in the past and who are yet under 21 years of age.

Now, do Senators feel that they are doing the right thing by these boys when they leave these deferred classifications as they are? Mr. President, I regret the necessity of calling anybody to war, but I shall not willingly subscribe to all these exemptions, and that is what these deferred classifications are, and make the boy of 18 "pay the freight." They have been very liberal in those allowances, and the more liberal they are in those allowances the greater the demands are on the 18-year-old class.

Mr. President, I say this with all due respect, but there is not any Senator who can read the testimony before the Military Affairs Committee and come to any other conclusion than that it was their belief that at all hazards they should get the boys of 18, 19, and 20. The Secretary of War in these hearings made the following statement on page 73:

> My own judgment about it originally was that 19 should be the minimum, and I came to the 18 minimum only after very thorough study of the situation and with some reluctance, but finally believing it to be necessary to secure the appropriate number of men.

When the War Department comes to the Congress of the United States and says that the condition at the front is such that we need 4,000,000 men, I accept that statement without qualification, because that is a military proposition and I am without military experience; but when they come to me and say, "We must have the 18-year-old and the 19-year-old boys and preserve the classification which we have arbitrarily made," that is a question which addresses itself to me in my capacity as a United States Senator, and I will not surrender willingly my responsibility in that behalf.

Mr. President, on yesterday two very able speeches were made, one by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the other by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], bearing upon this question. They referred to the necessity of getting troops into Russia, as if that at this time should influence the judgment of Senators in fixing the age limit.

I am in hearty accord with them when they say it is our desire that a great army should be in Russia, but I listened very patiently to hear either one of those Senators tell me how we were going to get that army into Russia at this time. The great battle is on the western front. We should send our armies where the fighting is the fastest; we should send them where the need is the greatest; we should send them to join hands with the British and the French and the Belgians and the Italians.

Now, if we desire to send 500,000 troops to Russia we have not the ships with which to send them. We can now send 500,000 troops to the western front more quickly than we can send 100,000 to Russia. Yes; let us surround the Teuton powers with armies when we can, but let us not dissipate the forces we have now to go after a will-o'-the-wisp. Then if it becomes necessary when we have the means to send these troops across there; if it is necessary to send a great army of millions of men, I am willing to do that; but when the Chief of Staff tells me what 2,000,000 men can do and what 4,000,000 men can do, and when they have got between six and seven millions in the deferred classes under the first registration, and they will get more than 10,000,000 out of the contemplated registration if the age limit is increased from 31 to 45 years, I do not see my way clear to tell the boys of 18 to shoulder arms.

Member of Local Board.

Claim for exemption or deferred classification.

Note to claimants: This form is to be used for claiming exemption or deferred classification by or in respect of any registrant and for stating the grounds of claim. Place a cross (X) in column A opposite the division that states the ground of claim. Boards are required to consider only grounds thus indicated by the claimant in column A.

CLASS I.

Col. A.	Div.
.....	A	Single man without dependent relatives.
.....	B	Married man, with or without children, or father of motherless children, who has habitually failed to support his family.
.....	C	Married man dependent on wife for support.
.....	D	Married man, with or without children, or father of motherless children: man not usefully engaged, family supported by income independent of his labor.
.....	E	Unskilled farm laborer.
.....	F	Unskilled industrial laborer.
.....	.....	Registrant by or in respect of whom no deferred classification is claimed or made.
.....	.....	Registrant who fails to submit Questionnaire and in respect of whom no deferred classification is claimed or made.
.....	.....	All registrants not included in any other division in this schedule.

CLASS II.

.....	A	Married man with children or father of motherless children, where such wife or children or such motherless children are not mainly dependent upon his labor for support for the reason that there are other reasonably certain sources of adequate support (excluding earnings or possible earnings from the labor of the wife) available, and that the removal of the registrant will not deprive such dependents of support.
.....	B	Married man, without children, whose wife, although the registrant is engaged in a useful occupation, is not mainly dependent upon his labor for support, for the reason that the wife is skilled in some special class of work which she is physically able to perform and in which she is employed, or in which there is an immediate opening for her under conditions that will enable her to support herself decently and without suffering or hardship.
.....	C	Necessary skilled farm laborer in necessary agricultural enterprise.
.....	D	Necessary skilled industrial laborer in necessary industrial enterprise.

CLASS III.

.....	A	Man with dependent children (not his own), but toward whom he stands in relation of parent.
.....	B	Man with dependent aged or infirm parents.
.....	C	Man with dependent helpless brothers or sisters.
.....	D	County or municipal officer.
.....	E	Highly trained fireman or policeman, at least 3 years in service of municipality.
.....	F	Necessary customhouse clerk.
.....	G	Necessary employee of United States in transmission of the mails.
.....	H	Necessary artificer or workman in United States armory or arsenal.
.....	I	Necessary employee in service of United States.
.....	J	Necessary assistant, associate, or hired manager of necessary agricultural enterprise.
.....	K	Necessary highly specialized technical or mechanical expert of necessary industrial enterprise.
.....	L	Necessary assistant or associate manager of necessary industrial enterprise.

CLASS IV.

Col. A.	Div.
.....	A	Man whose wife or children are mainly dependent on his labor for support.
.....	B	Mariner actually employed in sea service of citizen or merchant in the United States
.....	C	Necessary sole managing, controlling, or directing head of necessary agricultural enterprise.
.....	D	Necessary sole managing, controlling, or directing head of necessary industrial enterprise.

CLASS V.

.....	A	Officers—legislative, executive, or judicial of the United States or of State, Territory, or District of Columbia.
.....	B	Regular or duly ordained minister of religion.
.....	C	Student who on May 18, 1917, was preparing for ministry in recognized school.
.....	D	Persons in military or naval service of United States.
.....	E	Alien enemy.
.....	F	Resident alien (not an enemy) who claims exemption.
.....	G	Person totally and permanently physically or mentally unfit for military service.
.....	H	Person morally unfit to be a soldier of the United States.
.....	I	Licensed pilot actually employed in the pursuit of his vocation.
.....		Member of well-recognized religious sect or organization, organized and existing on May 18, 1917, whose then existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form, and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein.

Registrant or other interested person must answer the following question.

Q. Do you claim exemption or deferred classification in respect of the registrant named above? If so, state the division of each class and each class in which you claim that he should be classified.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it is my intention to support the pending bill as it has been reported from the Military Affairs Committee. I shall do so from an overwhelming sense of public duty. I do not profess to be familiar with military conditions and military requirements beyond the information which is given to us by those who are supposed to have military knowledge and into whose hands the fortunes of this great war have been committed.

The thought of 4,000,000 of Americans fighting the battles of the country 3,000 miles away from home, an Army composed of the very flower of American manhood, and subjected to all the horrors of modern warfare, is a most distressing, albeit an inspiring, one. The necessity of increasing our Army in order to provide against the natural waste of war and to make it so supremely effective as to insure speedy victory is and ought to be the controlling motive upon which the Senate will act.

Mr. President, I hoped when a year ago last May we passed the draft act that the men provided by it would prove amply sufficient for our military and naval purposes. Many of those supporting the measure were of that impression, and I entertained the conviction that their assurance would be verified by the lapse of time. Under that act nearly 10,000,000 of men between the ages of 21 and 31 were registered. From the operations of the draft many more than two-thirds of them were excluded. I take it, Mr. President, that those exclusions were necessary because of the work which must be done behind the lines, and I feel very sure that it is because of that exclusion that this bill is largely required.

I shall vote for this measure, Mr. President, because I believe that it will be a means of ending the war successfully and soon. I believe it is better to expose the young manhood of this country to the horrors of the front and to slaughter Germans now than to allow Germans to continue an indiscriminate and long-delayed slaughter of Americans and their allies in the future. We may be mistaken in regard to our hopes and our predictions, but we shall at least have the solemn consolation of knowing that, according to the best judgment which the highest authorities can give us, we have attempted to do our duty.

I rose, Mr. President, however, to speak upon an amendment to this bill which I had the honor of introducing in the Military Affairs Committee and which received the practically unanimous indorsement of the members of that body. Not all of them voted for it; none voted, as I recall, against it, although some voiced their objections to it. The amendment to which I refer is designed to provide means of compelling men who are fortunate enough to be assigned to work at home to perform that work, to the end that the man not so fortunate may at all times feel that the army in America—the great industrial army and each unit thereof—is doing its best in the common task imposed by this war upon every man and every woman enjoying American institutions and subject to American responsibilities.

I think, Mr. President, that some further legislation upon this subject is required largely because that which we have seems up to this time to have been ineffectual. That may be due to lack of positive administration or perhaps to the inefficiency of the law itself, but the fact remains that the act of May, 1917, providing that no exemption or exclusion shall continue when cause therefor no longer exists, does not seem to have been fully enforced or is perhaps not sufficiently explicit to be capable of vigorous enforcement.

Mr. President, the bill which we are about to pass, like the act of which it is an amendment, is to be passed because it is absolutely necessary to the public welfare, because in this crisis it is imperatively demanded. We were told during the discussion preceding the passage of the act of May, 1917, that it was the most democratic military bill ever considered by Congress, because it was universally applicable and no man could escape the operation of its provisions unless clearly within the exemptions therein specified, and, if we examine the body of the law, Mr. President, we find that that is literally true. But, as I have stated, the exemptions are overwhelmingly greater than the classification which subjects a portion of these men to military duty, and it is because out of that classification there remain so few yet to be called to the colors without invading other ages that the War Department and the President have asked for the enactment of this additional measure.

Mr. President, if all men subject to military duty, having none dependent upon them in the true sense of the word and unmindful of the obligations of industry and the need for proper equipment, could be called there would be an abundance of material easily available under the old law, and therefore would make further consideration of this bill wholly unnecessary; but we do not invade these classes, because, with the exception of those who are physically disabled and those who have dependents upon them, they are as imperatively needed at home; their activities are so essential to the constant work of war production that to transfer them from these deferred classifications into the one making them liable to military duty is out of the question.

Of course I do not refer now to that extremely fortunate class of young gentlemen who have been able to secure commissions and who are engaged in the several departments and bureaus far away from the echoing guns of the German Army and entirely out of reach of dangers, except those which may be encountered upon the gay streets of the Capital City.

Mr. President, some of the men now exempted, I am sorry to say—exempted because of their peculiar skill in various industries, exempted because of their superior productive capacity in the various pursuits that minister to the prosecution of the war—have not been doing their best, if the reports in the public press are to be credited and if our individual experiences may be relied upon, and I presume the same will be said, unless legislation such as is embodied in this amendment shall be placed upon the statute books, of many of those who apply for and obtain similar exemption under the operations of this act.

In saying this, I repudiate the charge which has been made from some sources that this amendment is a deliberate or any attack upon labor, or that it is a reflection upon the great mass of the labor of this country. That can not be, Mr. President, unless that mass is not and has not been giving its best to the work of the war. There are slackers in all communities. There are slackers in every department and every pursuit of life. There are slackers in peace as there are slackers in war; and it is that class of people, whether they belong to organizations or not, whether they are in the East or in the West, whether they be black or white, Jew or Gentile, that this amendment is designed to reach. It can only be upon the assumption that all these people are members of organized industries, or workmen organized in industries, that the charge can be founded. Even then, Mr. President, I deny that it could be successfully sustained.

Mr. President, war in modern times is war between nations, not armies; between peoples, and not military departments. This war is the marshaling of the assets of the great central empires of Europe upon one side and the allied nations upon the other. It is a war in which men and engineering and manufacture and agriculture and psychology and every conceivable faculty, acquired or inherent, have been and must continue to be enlisted until the end.

Let me ask what would become of the armies of Germany or of England if behind them the seething industries, the tilled fields, and the vast mass of activity everywhere constant should cease for the brief space of 60 days? Why, Mr. President, the war would end, and end in favor of those peoples continuing the activities of the various elements that to-day minister to modern war. The manufacture of shrapnel, of ordnance, of means of transportation, the digging of coal, the operation of railways, the building of ships, the sowing and the gleaning of wheat, the tilling of the soil, the raising of flocks, the increase of our live-stock industry—all these things are as essential to the sustenance of the allied armies as the presence of that mighty host which to-day confronts the flower of the German Army and which is driving it slowly but surely back to the frontiers of the German Empire. It requires a scientific distribution of man power. The duty is devolved upon the Government of the United States to say where a particular individual shall contribute his proportion of effort and of energy to the common cause, and then to see that he does it.

When skilled in some scientific or mechanical pursuit, or engaged in the raising of foodstuffs, or versed in the arts of transportation, naturally very properly the subject of the draft should be assigned to the duty of carrying on that calling for the general welfare not as a favor to him but because the interests of that great political unit which we call the United States of America require it. The classification is not made as a favor; it is made for the public interest and from necessity. And when these various elements are sifted from the general mass subject to the draft, the remainder must find exemption through physical disability or because of the absolute dependence of others upon them, or go to the colors. Many of them have waived, and many will waive, such exemptions, and share the glory and invite the fate which unfortunately will come to many a gallant boy to-day in the full tide of youth and strength, to-morrow a thing that was and never can be again.

Mr. President, what is required of these men who have no skill in any pursuit and who are not needed for home employment? Some one has said that all organized society, in its last analysis, depends upon force. In my judgment, the best definition of republican government that ever fell from the lips of man was uttered upon this floor by the great Senator from New York, Mr. Root, some time ago. He declared that republican government was organized self-control; there you have the whole scheme of democracy—intelligent democracy, law-abiding democracy, the democracy of America and of the Anglo-Saxon race.

These men in classification A, Mr. President, must don the uniform of their country. They must go to the training camps and there undergo a long system of severe, but necessary, discipline. When they have become hardened to the requirements of war we transport them to the seashore, where they embark upon transports in vast numbers for a foreign country. The danger zone begins before the shores of their native land have receded in the distance from their vision. Every moment of the time until the welcome shores of England or of France shall break upon their delighted vision they are subjected to all the possible horrors of submarine warfare. But go they must, and they go gladly. Thus far they have largely escaped this terrible and ever-present danger; but only those who have made the voyage, Mr. President, and only the loved ones at home, whose hearts follow the transports throughout their long and perilous journey, can speak from the fullness of their hearts and tell us what that experience is.

These men can not strike. They can not refuse to go. Duty calls, and they have answered. But we require ships to care for them after their arrival; without fleets they may become as helpless as though they were unarmed altogether. We are building ships; but are we building them as fast as we can or as fast as we should? Are we building them so fast that the submarine disasters can be overtaken? I hope so, Mr. President; but whenever I see the familiar announcement that several thousand men have suspended work in a shipyard for better wages and better conditions of employment my mind instantly reverts to the American front, to the boys we have over there, and who must be sustained by the Government which sent them if that Government is to be vindicated in the eyes of posterity. And I marvel that these workers do not vision the same great obligation.

But, Mr. President, these boys have only begun their task when they shall have disembarked. They undergo more discipline, more training hour after hour and day after day, marches across the country, they are brigaded with other troops, they occupy trenches, confront gas attacks, the barrage, the machine guns, they make the charge over the top. These constitute their duties. No American Army, North or South, has ever yet failed the supreme test in the hour of crisis. They never will.

How about the man at home? He has not been permitted to remain at home as a favor, but to give his country the best that is in him toward the manufacture and production of the thing that contributes to the welfare of the Army in France, because he can perform that task better than his fellows. Now, what does this amendment propose? Simply that he shall do his bit here and do it all the time. Simply that the cause of his exemption shall not fail, or if it fails because of his own dereliction, then that he shall take his place in the trenches by the side of his brother in arms. Is there anything wrong about that, Mr. President? Is there anything un-American in that proposition? I have yet to hear it. It is so self-evident a fact that no man entertaining a proper sense of duty and of obligation can gainsay it for a moment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to vote for the Senator's amendment. I desire to vote for it because it is in the right direction, but I wish it could be so amended that it would have in it a real benefit to this country.

Let me call attention to the real danger, the real trouble, that is at the heart of the United States to-day in prosecuting this war. It is not the number of men that are out of employment so much as it is the slacking of those that are in employment. How does this bill reach them?

Let me ask the Senator to step down here any time and look at these squares under the shadow of the Capitol, where I have watched these men digging trenches. While for 35 years I probably have not lifted anything heavier than a lead pencil, if I could not perform three times the amount of labor that is being performed there I would be ashamed of myself. I would to God that our soldiers over in the trenches, digging in in the face of shot and shell, working laboriously throughout the night after fighting throughout the day, could pass down at one of these squares and watch the work going on there as I have watched it and asked other Senators to look upon it to see where the slacking was being done. I know what I would see. A man would take a shovel of dirt and throw it leisurely over and lay the spade or shovel down or rest for two minutes on the handle and then take another, and by actual count there were not one-fifth of the men there working at any one time—all resting, all killing time, all robbing the Government. I do not know that they are Americans; I think they are not. I think they are foreigners who are here to-day taking the place of our boys who are fighting for the Government. They are getting six and eight dollars a day, with pay on holidays for overtime, and that is the character of the work we are getting out of them.

If the Senator has an amendment that will say to these men, "We will pay you honest wages, but you shall do an honest day's work," it ought to receive 96 votes in the Senate. Will his amendment do it? I think not, because the same person under the amendment who is killing time down here, making it cost the Government three times as much as it ought to cost to produce the results it is producing, will continue in employment, and he will continue also to slack in his work.

These are not members of organized labor at all, because it is the lowest class of labor that you find here among the ordinary shovelers, colored and white men working there together. But it does seem to me that we ought to have some kind of an amendment that would compel every American man and woman to perform a full and honest day's work six days in the week while our soldiers are battling in France.

I wish the Senator could so word his amendment that we could reach the slacker who is pretending to work, and not merely the one who is avoiding the doing of any kind of work.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, what the Senator has described as taking place in Washington I think can be duplicated in many other places in the country. This amendment does not and can not reach that situation. I think no amendment to this bill that the Senate would consider can reach it. It can be remedied in but one way, in my judgment, and that is by the conscription of labor. I know of no reason why, in time of war, when conscription is the rule of the Government, it should not be resorted to for every purpose, labor included, which is essential to the prosecution of the war.

I realize, Mr. President—and I intend to refer to it a little later on in my remarks—that where wages increase abnormally production decreases. That is so universally the case that I know of no exceptions to it in history save where great emergencies are on, the menace of which directly overhangs the community.

I am doing with this amendment, Mr. President—or, at least, I am trying to do—what seems to me to be expedient and possible to accomplish with regard to those men who are exempted from military duty because of their ability to better serve the country, and because of that reason only, and who fail or refuse to serve.

Mr. President, wages were never so high as they are in the United States. Perhaps they may not be too high. I have my opinion about that, but it is not necessary to this discussion, beyond my desire to draw a contrast between what a man receives here in the performance of the tasks assigned to him under the draft law and the compensation received by the soldier in the trenches—$8 a day, $10 a day, $12 and $15 a day, as against $1 a day in the trenches.

Mr. President, I am unable to perceive in what respect labor conditions can be bettered over what they now are in America, unless, indeed, we take the last, final step in the collectivist's solution of a social problem and wipe out all private ownership in property, in the products of the hand and brain, and submit to its universal distribution.

If any argument were needed—and I think none is needed—to support my contention, it is found in the fact that in addition to this exemption—for that is what it amounts to—is the enormous compensation paid to the individual exempted, thus imposing upon him the double obligation of doing his best during this war.

Mr. President, what is and what has been the situation? If I attempted to enumerate the strikes, the cessations of labor in the essential industries of the United States during the last 60 days, I am afraid that I would have to defer all further comment upon the subject until to-morrow.

While the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] was speaking yesterday afternoon a page brought me a copy of the Evening Star. There I found an account of a strike in Virginia in an essential war industry, the demand being an increase from 75 cents to 87½ cents per hour. The men employed had suspended all work until the controversy could be settled, and the settlement of such a controversy with such men means the full granting of their demands. If I read to the Senate all of the letters and telegrams I have received from different parts of the country since the introduction of this amendment calling my attention to specific instances of suspensions of work in war industries, I think I could exhaust the next two hours of time.

But there are features of some of these abstentions from work which, to say the least of it, are a little peculiar. For example, I was told the other day by a gentleman claiming to have first knowledge of the subject that a demand in one of the great Connecticut manufacturing centers, submitted to the duly constituted arbitration authorities, was followed, through the impatience of the men for a speedy decision, by what they pleased to call a recess—not a strike, just simply a recess, a vacation, if you please. Another instance: In New Jersey some three or four thousand men engaged in an essential, vital industry made certain demands not immediately complied with, and as a result they were invited by their leaders to go fishing. That is what they called it. "A rose by whatever name smells as sweet." The work was suspended because the men said that the fishing was good. In other instances called to my attention men have left their unions and then quit work in order to absolve themselves from the obligation of their organizations. Others get so much money in three days of work they loaf the rest of the week, and still others, because they get double pay on Sunday, knock off on Saturday, substituting that for their holiday in order that the attraction of double wages may be availed of.

Turn to any part of the country you please and you are confronted with these unfortunate conditions, notwithstanding the fact, Mr. President, that through an agreement solemnly entered into between the representatives of labor and capital, between employer and employed, a great industrial board of commissioners has been created, charged with the duty of inquiring into and determining these differences, to the end that the suspension of work may not result from differences between employer and employee.

Mr. President, I read of a strike last week, I think in Brooklyn or Long Island, in a factory which has a Government contract for the manufacture of 1,700,000 gas masks, for better wages and better conditions of labor. I do not know whether it has been settled or not. I hope so. But, Mr. President, can there be anything more horrible than a suspension of work in the production of masks at this time?

During our investigation of aircraft an American officer came before us, given a leave of absence because he had been gassed near Amiens during the German drive of last March and April. He was a magnificent man physically, the son of a Minnesota governor, a great, powerful, stalwart specimen of an American soldier. His face was the color of a corpse, and he could scarcely talk above a whisper. He assured us that he was not gassed seriously and that his companions did not fare so well. This devilish device of German scientists, abhorrent to all the laws of civilized warfare and humanity, was suddenly launched upon a splendid body of Englishmen and Americans holding an advanced position with the flags of their country flying over them, and because their gas masks were not immediately available many of them lost their lives.

Death in this form, Mr. President, is most horrible. The substance of the lungs is dissolved by contact with the deadly element, the face turns green, the victim writhes upon the ground, his body becomes rigid, and he tries in vain to suck the oxygen into his lungs while the slow but awful processes of the poison prolongs his tortures; and in America men and women, highly paid, are striking in the gas-mask factories for better wages, many of whom were doubtless detailed and placed in the deferred classification because of their skill, indifferent to the fact that this unspeakable horror may visit American soldiers unequipped with masks because of their delinquency.

Senators, what will be your sensations if some morning we read of an appalling gas disaster caused by the absence of American gas masks through the failure of men deferred for the purpose of manufacturing them to work by day and by night in their production?

My God, Mr. President, can there be any question in the mind of any thinking American about the necessity of requiring this work to be done by the men who have been specially detailed and exempted from the trenches for the purpose of doing it? If so, let him exhibit himself to the American people, that he may be forever gibbeted by public opinion.

The same need, Mr. President, is present in aircraft and in munitions—in everything that ministers to the genius of war and essential to a swift and speedy victory.

We are told by some labor leaders that this amendment is absolutely unessential; that it is an attack upon labor or a reflection upon it. I will deal with that in a moment, but first I want to call attention to two announcements of August 12—one by the President of the United States and the other by Mr. Gompers—both provoked by unsatisfactory labor conditions.

The President, in a proclamation of the 11th to the coal miners and operators, pleaded with them to give their maximum efforts to the production of coal, to the end that the threatened shortage next winter may be averted. He asked the miners to work full time and urged those who are essential to the industries to accept a deferred classification in the draft. The President of the United States was obliged to appeal to the coal miners not only to work to prevent a coal famine next winter but to accept deferred classification for that purpose. He said:

> The existing scarcity of coal is creating a grave danger—in fact, the most serious that confronts us—and calls for prompt and vigorous action on the part of both operators and miners.
> Without an adequate supply our war program will be retarded; the effectiveness of our fighting forces in France will be lessened; the lives of our soldiers will be unnecessarily endangered and their hardships increased; and there will be much suffering in many homes throughout the country during the coming winter.
> I am well aware that your ranks have been seriously depleted by the draft, by voluntary enlistment, and by the demands of other essential industries. This handicap can be overcome, however—> and sufficient coal can be mined in spite of it if everyone connected with the industry, from the highest official to the youngest boy, will give his best work each day for the full number of work hours.

Says the President—

Mr. Gompers referred particularly to the coal situation in my State, and I think the same conditions may be prevalent in the State represented in part by my friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who sits before me, miners overprosperous, getting too much money on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday to require working on Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday. Perhaps I have not classified the days exactly; perhaps I have not given the proper proportion, but the principle is there. Said Mr. Gompers:

> The actions of labor union secessionists are characterized as bolsheviki movements by Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, in a manifesto issued by him to-day as a result of union coal miners' dissensions in Colorado. He said in part:
> "If ever in the history of labor unions solidarity in action, fact, and spirit were necessary, now is the time. Secession in the labor movement must be effectually crushed if the interests of the toilers of America are to be protected."

Surely there must be something wrong with labor when Mr. Gompers finds it necessary to make such a public announcement as this. Yet he would have me remain silent lest I cast a reflection upon the members of his great organization.

Mr. President, let us see what shortage threatens to be. I have had occasion to criticize Mr. Garfield upon this floor, and I am therefore glad to be able to commend him. He has been particularly vigilant in calling attention to the condition of the coal output in the United States and in warning everyone of the necessity not only of producing as much coal as possible but economizing in its consumption. He said the other day:

> The country faces a coal shortage of 75,000,000 tons, the Fuel Administration announces. New England has been asked to cut all the firewood available to prevent fuel famine.

This is but one of many warnings, yet with winter upon our threshold, with the practical certainty of a coal shortage, many of our exempted miners are idling much of their time away.

We are face to face, Mr. President, as Mr. Cleveland once said, with a condition and not a theory, and it is a very serious and constantly aggravating condition.

Complaint is made that this amendment is aimed at labor unions. If labor unions are responsible for these conditions, it is true. If the labor unions justify these conditions, either directly or indirectly, by opposing amendments like this there may be something in the charge. Otherwise the charge is silly. I want to get at the man who has been exempted because of his particular industry and who fails to do his duty under that exemption, I do not care whether he belongs to a union or not. He is the individual who, I think, should be proceeded against under the provisions of a draft law and required to work or go to the front.

Among those who have opposed this amendment and who I understand have addressed Senators and promoted a propaganda all over the United States through the various affiliated organizations are the heads of the American Federation. Let me say, Mr. President, lest I be misunderstood, that I think the Federation as such, very largely in its accomplishments and the recommendations and public statements of Mr. Gompers, has been doing very patriotic and highly creditable work. I go further and say that the vast majority of the men who affiliate with the American Federation of Labor, both in enlistments and in the draft and also in industries, have been doing their bit in the most commendable way.

Because I want to get at the men whose conduct is a reflection upon the patriotism, the earnestness, and the zeal of the Federation it is rather amusing to be condemned and criticized as assailing their integrity and casting reflections upon their union.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator whether legislation is necessary to effect the purpose which he has in mind?

Mr. THOMAS. I presume the Senator is going to refer to the present law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have always understood that this was a privilege which was revocable by the board which grants it. It is a privilege which the President of the United States can set aside at any moment, and I should be very much surprised if it requires affirmative legislation to effect the purpose the Senator has in mind.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator was not here when I took the floor. I called attention to the existing law and to the fact that while the act seemed to be sufficient for the purpose, yet the experiences of the past year indicate either that it is not so or that it is not enforced to the letter, and the purpose of this amendment is to add a mandatory provision by which it can be made effective.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The point with me is this, if the Senator will pardon me: This legislation must be approved by the President or, of course, it can not become a law, unless it is passed over his head, which is not very likely; at least I would not anticipate such a result. But it must be approved by the President, and if he approves the proposed bill, with the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, why can he not exercise the power now? An adverse vote on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be a legislative interpretation of the present law and we might even retard what we have a desire to effect.

I only throw that out as a suggestion. I know, of course, the Senator from Colorado is very sincere and has enunciated a thought which must be in the minds of almost every citizen of the country.

There should be no favor for a man who is neither willing to work or fight, and in my judgment there is no permanent favor which has been extended to him which can not be revoked by the very authority which grants it, and it can be set aside altogether by the President of the United States by one stroke of the pen.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think perhaps that is true. This is a matter which has gravely concerned me for a long time. It may be that in my apprehension of consequences to the boys at the front I have been overzealous. It may be that the law which is now upon the statute books is amply sufficient for the purpose; but I have waited in vain to see that provision enforced as I think it ought to be enforced, and I have been fearful that it might be due perhaps to the weakness of the law itself. I do not think that is the case, because the law is explicit. Yet I determined upon full deliberation when this bill came up to offer an amendment which would put the question at rest by putting teeth into the law.

Of course, if the Senate rejects it, the responsibility is theirs; if the House of Representatives rejects it, the responsibility is theirs; if the President rejects it, then his is the responsibility; but so far as I am personally concerned, I must insist that we take some action upon this very serious problem.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator earlier in his remarks, when I was not upon the floor, may have expressed an opinion upon the question I am about to ask him, but I will ask him the question and he will know as to that. Did the Senator read the article in the Washington Star of last night by Mr. David Lawrence on this question?

Mr. THOMAS. I did.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to ask the Senator, then, if he remembers that Mr. Lawrence stated that in administration circles it was considered that the amendment proposed by the Senator was not necessary and that it was not looked upon with favor, or words to that effect?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did the Senator refer to this in the earlier part of his speech?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I did not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not having gone into the subject so thoroughly as has the Senator with reference to the powers contained in existing law or as to the method and manner by which the regulations to which Mr. Lawrence referred are enforced, I wondered what impression the article made upon the mind of the Senator—as to whether it satisfied him that his amendment was not necessary.

Mr. THOMAS. No; it did not. I have been told, though I know nothing personally about the fact, that Mr. Lawrence speaks for some in power. If that be true, I presume that he reflects the sentiment of those whom he may thus represent; I do not know. The purport of that article, coupled with some other incidents relating to this subject, only confirms my view that Congress should take direct action upon the subject. In the Official United States Bulletin of the 21st of August—two days ago—appears what is called a daily press interview by the Secretary of War, dated August 20. The Secretary there says:

> Gen. Crowder pointed out that the provision in the Senate bill is substantially what the Department is now doing and what there is now power to do, so that the provision inserted by the Senate amendment is simply making a legislative declaration of a policy already in effect.

Well, of course, Mr. President, if it is doing that it is doing something. If the policy is already in partial effect, I am very glad of it; but I should be delighted to see some concrete evidences of the enforcement of the act in all appropriate directions. The Secretary then goes on to say:

> A man who gets an industrial exemption by reason of his being an indispensable operative in an indispensable industry ceases to have that exemption as soon as he ceases to be an operative in that industry.

If that were automatically so, of course, the cessation of work would of itself serve to transfer the delinquent from his deferred to the drafted class, and my amendment would be unnecessary.

The interview continues:

> The boards have never applied that in the case of bona fide disputes between labor as an aggregate and the employers as an aggregate, but they have always prevented a man taking refuge behind an industrial exemption and then discontinuing the work for which he received the exemption, so the apparent purpose of the Senate amendment is already in operation.

But that is not the apparent purpose of it. It is not the intended purpose of it, at any rate. This statement means, Mr. President, that if a man as an individual ceases work he becomes at once subject to the draft, but if a half dozen men or 2 dozen men or 15 or 20 men conclude to quit work, then the law does not apply; in other words, if men in their organized capacity, whether they are exempted or not, see fit to quit work the administration does not apply the provisions of the present law to them. Why not? Is a strike something sacred; something that is exempt from the operations of law during this war? Is it one of those privileges, Mr. President, which are above the Constitution?

Many ways—in fact, every possible way, I think, that can be conceived of—have been devised for the settlement of disputes collectively arising between employer and employee, so as to prevent the cessation of work. Why, then, the exemption of the strike? Is it political? Do industrial conditions require it? What is the reason for differentiating between a body of men who collectively refuse to work, all of whom may perhaps have been exempted because of the responsible nature of their calling, and the same body of men who go out one by one and refuse to work?

Mr. President, Mr. Morrison, of the Federation of Labor, did me the honor a day or two ago, at a hearing before a committee of the other House, to call attention to my amendment, which he characterized, among other things, as an insult to labor. The statement is actually silly. I care nothing for that. When a man descends to epithet, it is very clear that he is barren of argument. Mr. Morrison says:

> Its clear intent is the conscription of labor. There is no necessity for such legislation.

Mr. President, this is not intended as a conscription of labor; but, again I ask, in times of war why should labor not be conscripted like everything else if it becomes necessary to win this great struggle? We take the boy from his mother's arms—we are going down to the age of 18—and we transport him across the seas and confront him with the trained legions of the Kaiser. Can we not conscript the work that is necessary to make his perilous duty as effective as possible? A true conscript law, when the Nation is engaged in a great war like this, should include every man from 18 to 65, I do not care what his calling is, and assign him to do the work that he is best fitted for and see that he does it.

You say that is militarism. So it is; but, Mr. President, when we are fighting a war like this the only way in which we can succeed is to go under the domination of what we call militarism while it lasts. Fight the devil with fire. Therefore I am not appalled by the assertion that we are trying to conscript labor. I am only concerned in saying that this does nothing of the sort.

If this war lasts a year and a half longer—and I am very much afraid that it will last much longer than that—the necessity of doing this very thing may become apparent. If it does, and I am living, I affirm that I shall support and vote for it, because I want to see this war won. We are in it to the hilt. I believe in killing Germans and killing them all the time and killing as many as possible, while preserving our own forces to every extent consistent with the performance of their duties. Until that policy—I will call it policy—becomes the American policy this war will drag along. We have been engaged too much and too long in the effort to differentiate between the Hohenzollerns and the German people. This is a war of the German people, and it has been from the start, not only the German people in the German Empire but the German people everywhere, with the honorable exception of the majority of the American citizens of German origin in the United States. We want to recognize that fact and to act accordingly. We used to have a saying on the western plains—and it was a good one in the old days—that the only good Indian is the dead one. The only good German, in my eyes, is a dead German. But we are not conscripting labor at all.

Mr. Morrison also says:

> It is an attack upon the loyalty of the workingmen of the United States, which will be bitterly resented by them if enacted into law.

Mr. President, how is it possible to impugn the loyalty of labor by insisting that exempted men should do the tasks assigned them? That logic may be sound; it may be unanswerable; but I confess I am unable to follow it. Far be it from me to reflect upon American labor or upon a single unit of American labor that is performing its duty, but let me say, lest I overlook it, that I am in receipt of scores of letters from humble members of many labor unions who wish me Godspeed in this effort. One of them says:

> I have a boy at the front; he volunteered. I am doing my bit, and I want my neighbor to do his, because I want my boy to come back. He may not come back; but, if so, I do not want to reflect that he might have come back if everybody had done his duty at home.

In my mind, Mr. President, that is the spirit of American labor, thank God, and I hope it will continue to be during this war.

Mr. President, I sometimes fear, but I hope I am mistaken, that the heads of organized labor, or many of them, propose to take advantage of war conditions to clinch the hold of organized labor upon the country. When I read this criticism of Mr. Morrison my mind reverted to a speech made by him last year in Buffalo at a great labor convention. I think the President addressed it, or a letter from the President was read to it. It was a wonderful meeting and one whose resolutions caused a thrill of joy to pulsate in the heart of every lover of his country. But Mr. Morrison when reelected secretary said to the convention:

> I have only this to say: That as in the past I will give all the time I have to assist in organizing the unorganized workers and retaining the standards established by the trade-union movement, and I hope that during the coming year the organized forces of the Federation will capture the last trench of the unorganized workers and organize the employees of the United States Steel Co. and the Bethlehem Steel Co.

Mr. President, I have no objection to that. I think my record—a somewhat humble one—will bear me out in the assertion that I have been a good friend of organized labor, or I have tried to be; but I do not think that it is entirely consistent with patriotism to announce that during the crisis of the Nation's life advantage will be taken of it to organize two great institutions of the country, unless it can be done just as it would be done in times of peace. It comes pretty near to being a threat against the integrity of our cause; and Mr. Morrison may regard this proposed amendment as interfering somewhat with the program there so boldly announced.

I recall another speech made shortly afterwards at Kansas City—last year, I think—by Mr. James O'Connell, who is also one of the high officials of the Federation of Labor. He addressed "a wildly applauding boiler makers' convention." He said:

You are meeting now, my friends, and you will be expected before this convention adjourns to make a declaration as to what the position of the Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, and Helpers of America is, so that the world may know. It is not a mere question of being behind President Wilson. That is a sort of catchy expression, and catch phrases sounds nice. The question is, are you behind yourself? If you are you will say so before you leave here. We took advantage of the situation as we found it abroad, and before war was declared by the United States we saw to it that organized labor was going to get proper recognition and that conditions of employment and standards of living would not be interfered with, would not be lowered. Nothing can take place, nothing can be done, unless we are consulted and practically give our consent to it.

You have the shipbuilding, and we are not talking about getting a penny an hour increase now. Now we are striking for dollars. We have forgot that there is such a thing on the market as a penny any more. * * * Out on the Pacific coast, * * * Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, all asking for dollars—$2 a day increase, $3 a day increase. It does not frighten anybody any more. We are just coming together and going to get dollars now instead of pennies. Now, I want you to get it in your heads to talk about dollars, not pennies, in your organization. The opportunity is presented for the first time in the history of the United States Government, practically a union contract signed between the Government and the officers of the department and affiliated organizations, practically requiring that the shipbuilders of America come to Washington and put their feet under the table with the labor leaders to settle their troubles. * * * Uncle Sam is paying union committees to come to Washington and meet the employers. Isn't that a pretty good union agreement? That is only the beginning.

* * * Now, I hope the boilermakers, in convention here, will get in their minds that beautiful thought of "more"—

I believe that the word "Bolsheviki" means "a man who wants more"—

Place your officers in a position to go out and demand, and then back them up. Give them your united and undivided support. And in this crisis, instead of our organization being wiped out, instead of our power being lessened, we will come out after the war is over bigger and greater and grander and better understood than we ever were before.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator state from what publication he is reading?

Mr. THOMAS. I have just read a quotation in the World's Work for February, 1918, from the speech of Mr. James O'Connell, I think at Kansas City at the boiler makers' convention, and quoted by Mr. Burton J. Hendrick in an article entitled "The leadership of Samuel Gompers."

Mr. President, I do not propose—I have not the time—to comment upon that statement; but is it not a fair deduction to say that it outlines the purpose of an organization to take advantage of the Nation's extremity and get all they can and keep getting it; to think in terms of dollars instead of cents, and also to emphasize a meeting in Washington, with Uncle Sam paying the bills, as a mere step in the direction of the universal and progressive demands of labor for higher pay and more of it? Let it come, if that be the trend of the times, but let no man or set of men take advantage of an opportunity caused by the calamities of a great war, involving the life of the Nation and certainly involving countless lives of American soldiers, to interfere with labor conditions, keeping them chaotic and disturbed, interfering with production, and thus lowering the striking power of this great Republic.

But, Mr. President, we are told that this amendment, if adopted, will enable capital to exploit labor, and I think a Senator upon the floor here yesterday expressed himself as unwilling to see anything of that sort as the result of our action. So would I; but of all the arguments or statements that have been offered against this amendment—and I say it with all respect—that it is certainly the poorest. It does not approach the domain of argument. The exploitation of labor by capital has frequently occurred; it may occur as frequently in the future; but capital can never exploit labor when the demand for labor exceeds the supply; it is an economic and social impossibility. Some old fellow said years ago that he did not know anything about the tariff, but he knew that when two men were seeking him his wages went up; and when he was seeking employment from two men his wages went down.

There is not an employer to-day who would dare try to exploit his employees. What would be the result? They would, as a Senator near me suggests, go somewhere else, and thousands of hands are stretched forth urging him to come and offering him better conditions, although no attempt is made to exploit him.

I think, Mr. President, that just now the boot is on the other leg. I think labor is—I will not say exploiting capital, although I believe it—but exploiting the Treasury of the United States. We are paying more than double prices for everything that we are producing in this war, and the man who is getting extraordinary wages and who refuses to work until he can get still better ones is just as much of a profiteer as the employer who takes advantage of his contract to make an undue dishonest profit. The difference is in degree and not in kind.

I have no use for what is called the "profiteer," which I understand to mean a man who takes advantage of opportunities at this time to make extraordinary profits from the Government. We can reach the big profiteer through the income tax and the war-profits tax; whether we can reach other and smaller profiteers remains to be seen; but I hope that whatever the Senate may do with this amendment, it will not be defeated upon the ground that it is an exploitation of labor.

The Government has favored labor ever since this war began. We have passed legislation here forbidding the Government of the United States to develop labor in its own factories, forbidding the payment of bonuses for piecework, and labor threatened to strike, if I am correctly informed, in the event the Senate amendment to the naval bill became the law. I could name other instances, Mr. President, and it may be all right, perhaps; but surely the Government has done everything that it should have done to stimulate labor in every direction, both by legislation and appeal. Yet our labor troubles multiply.

Mr. President, some sections of organized labor are engaged in attempting to secure immunity for one Thomas Mooney. He may be guilty or he may be innocent; I have my own opinion about it, and it is a very decided one. What has impressed me about it was a threat some time ago of a universal strike in the event the laws of the State of California were followed by its governor and Mooney's sentence on conviction of murder in the first degree was carried out.

I do not regard that as patriotic. It is perilously close to treason. I saw a statement the other day—and I think it is true—to the effect that a large delegation of organized workmen, claiming to represent a great many more, went to the President and insisted that he should grant Mr. Mooney a new trial, regardless of the action of the sovereign State of California and, of course, regardless of the Constitution of the United States. I do not know how he can do it; but the fact that two lawyers, one a most eminent lawyer of national reputation, are said to have enjoined the same thing upon the President. That gave it certainly a very sinister appearance.

I am not charging organized labor with the responsibility of all these conditions; I am merely calling attention to them as emphasizing the proposition that I am not legislating in the dark, that there is a slackness in production in many places, that there are threatened strikes based on preposterous causes, and that, so far as the Government can do so, we should put a stop to it. There is no slacking in Germany. Every man there must do his duty and do it all the time. Not only that, but every poor Englishman, American, Frenchman, and Italian prisoner is compelled to work day and night in the mines, in the fields, and in the factories of Germany producing munitions and equipment to be used against their own countrymen. The German factories are running by day and by night, and the man who dares to stop is shot.

I hear some one ask, "Would you apply German conditions to American labor?" No; not at all. I would appeal to American workmen to so conduct themselves that there should be no necessity for even referring to such conditions, interfering at present only as regards men in deferred classifications; but if production in Germany had slackened for a short space of time prior to the collapse in Russia this war would have been ended; and it has been said many times that men should take advantage of the experiences of their opponents.

Mr. President, it is said that this bill interferes with the rights of strike. What is the right of strike? In peace times we know what it means—that no man can be compelled to work against his will; if he wants to quit, he has the right to quit; he can quit individually or he can quit collectively—but I deny that the right to strike exists in time of war, in the absence of the most abundant and overwhelming justification, the existence of which I can not conceive at the present time. To my mind, in these days of stress and of crisis a strike is prima facie un-American; it certainly lowers production, and it may seriously interrupt or interfere with the progress of events in the prosecution of the war.

I can assure every workingman that this administration—and its career thus far justifies the assertion—that a strike brought about by causes that warrant it will never be followed by punishment of any kind. On the contrary, the conditions complained of will be rectified. I know of instances, if human testimony is to be credited, where strikes have been settled by mutual agreement, and the employers then compelled to comply with the demands of the strikers, to operate retroactively, through governmental interference and by governmental demand. Surely, in view of such conditions, no man need fear that if he has the right to suspend work because of intolerable labor conditions he will not be able to apply to the Government and receive ample protection.

In his letter to me, which I placed in the RECORD, Mr. Gompers gives assurance of the fact that our production has been greater than ever, for which due credit should be given. I give it freely. It has been great, but it is not great enough. It can not be too great during this war; and it is not great enough unless and until it represents the combined product of every man and woman doing his and her full duty in the place to which they have been assigned or which they have chosen.

We need ships. How bitterly we need them, only those who are in charge of affairs can fully appreciate. A great deal has been said regarding this bill, about delay in increasing the extent of our draft requirements. I want to say that men have been mobilized and have been transported to France just as rapidly as we have been able to do so, and at the same time preserve the assurance of our ability to command sufficient tonnage to keep them supplied with all that they need; and our shipping program is behind. Every man in every shipyard in the country should be glad to work, if necessary, 12 hours every day—15, 20, if necessary—in order that our tonnage may be sufficient for our needs, in order that production may be ahead of the waste caused by the submarine, in order that we may transport troops, if necessary, not only across one but across two oceans.

We need munitions; we can not manufacture munitions fast enough. We need artillery; we are behind upon artillery; how badly, I dare not say. Up to this time we have been largely dependent upon our allies for our artillery supply. We need aircraft. Mr. President, at the end of nearly one year and a half we have produced something like 1,000 so-called fighting planes. Upon the front we need every air vessel that can be constructed and flown. We have a splendid equipment of young men, trained aviators, over on the front and in this country, straining like hounds at the leash. They can do nothing until they have airships; and when they get them—and I fervently hope they will get them soon, in all their variety of fighting and bombing and reconnoissance—then we will see the beginning of the end. But we can not get them save by the unremitting toil of our own people.

A few days ago I was told that during the hours of labor walking delegates had the habit of calling the foremen out of some of the places where these manufacturing operations were being conducted, giving them instructions and consulting them, without regard to the effect on their time or their duties. It will take a vast amount of clothing to supply 2,000,000 more men, and shoes, and military equipment of all kinds, and transportation. If there is any direction where war activities should not be carried on to their fullest extent and where production should not be conducted to the highest point of efficiency, I am unable to mention it. Yet men are refusing to work till their grievances, or what they call their grievances, are adjusted.

Mr. President, for whose benefit are we fighting this war. For the capitalists, for the leisure classes, for the workmen, for any particular portion of our population? For what are we making these gigantic sacrifices and expending not only all our visible treasure, but mortgaging the generations for centuries to come, unless it be to preserve to the individual, whether he be a workingman or a capitalist, black or white. Jew or Gentile, those priceless privileges of freedom and liberty which are inseparable from a republican form of government—the right to strike, if you please; the right to labor or to abstain from labor, if you please; the right to enjoy life and to the pursuit of happiness; the right to everything that makes life dear; the right of the slacker and the exemptionist just as fully as the right of the boy at the front and the family which he represents; the rights and the liberties and the freedom of all? Governments exist largely for the protection of those otherwise defenseless; largely, in other words, for the poor, for the man who toils for his livelihood, cheered by the reflection that he lives in a country where perhaps his son can rise higher in the scale of social life than the point he has been able to attain.

It is for these, primarily, that this great war is being waged, and these enormous sacrifices have been demanded. If it be true that by insisting that those at home shall do their bit we are invading individual liberty, reflecting upon labor organizations, or attempting to exploit workmen—and it is not true—we might easily retort that at this time and at this hour even those things should be done if it be necessary for the protection and the welfare and the future existence of the American Republic.

Mr. President, I believe that the sentiment of the Nation demands legislation of this sort. I believe that every father with a son at the front or with a son to be included in the operation of this bill when it becomes a law; every mother whose boy to-day is wearing the uniform of his country, side by side and shoulder to shoulder with fellow Americans maintaining the honor and the integrity of the American Army away off on the blood-stained fields of France; every wife whose husband has heard the call of duty and left his family and his home, perhaps forever, that he may give to his country the highest test of devotion; every fair young girl whose heart's desire has been postponed, perhaps forever, because her lover has gone to the colors of his country, ready to march when the order is given, and brave the machine guns of the enemy—every one of these in their hearts' depths feel that those who stay at home should make, as far as they can, an equal sacrifice and see to it that the man at the front shall not falter for lack of all that he demands for the full and triumphant vindication of his Nation's integrity.

The great heart of the American people is sound, else we would not be in this war at all, and, Mr. President, we have only begun it. Every day we see in the public press the constantly lengthening lists of American dead and American wounded. Those somber lists will continue to lengthen as the shadows of winter come upon us as we advance toward the heart of the enemy's country, and the tears of widows and orphans will mingle with the snows of the coming season. Let us feel, Mr. President, that we at home, those who legislate and those who toil, have performed to the fullest that duty which this great tragedy of nations has placed upon their shoulders.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise simply to ask whether the Senator from Colorado will permit a question before he takes his seat. I was called from the Chamber just at the moment that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] was asking the Senator from Colorado a question and I did not have the opportunity to hear his reply. I ask it from the standpoint of one who thoroughly believes that every man in America must either work for the war or fight in the war.

This is the inquiry: Does the Senator from Colorado believe that under the existing law the thing he desires to accomplish can be accomplished, and does he propose this amendment because he believes there is lack of authority, or because he is fearful or uncertain about the enforcement of the existing law in the manner he desires to see it enforced?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I answered that question substantially to this effect: While the provision of the law seems to be ample, I have been unable to see any signs of its application, and consequently I thought we should require its enforcement by additional legislation. I also called attention to a statement of the Secretary of War, published in the Official Bulletin of the 21st of August, in which he said, in substance, that this provision had been enforced against individuals who discontinued work, but it was not enforced against labor in the aggregate, as he expresses it—that is to say, in the case of bona fide disputes between labor as an aggregate and employers as an aggregate—which I construe to mean that the law as it has been enforced, and therefore as it has been construed, is one which applies to an individual who refuses to work, but not to a number of individuals who may at the same time refuse to work. I also stated that I could see no difference in effect between the case of a man who refused to work individually and the case of half a dozen men who refused to work collectively.

Mr. CUMMINS. That was the point I had in mind. I gather that the administration has made that statement, and therefore I assume that the purpose of the amendment is really to reach a strike rather than the mere cessation of work by an individual.

Mr. THOMAS. No. That, of course, is the construction that I have placed upon this statement of the Secretary of War. The purpose of this amendment is to reach every man who, being exempted because of his skill in some necessary work, is not required to go to the front, and make him do his bit at home.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I gather, though the Senator thinks that the administration—and I mean the administration of the draft law—is already doing that so far as individuals are concerned——

Mr. THOMAS. The Secretary of War so announces.

Mr. CUMMINS. But at least is not doing it, so far as concerted cessation of work is concerned.

Mr. THOMAS. He says that specifically.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, suppose that the employer of labor, by unfair methods, creates a dispute that has real merit, and those who propose to quit work on account of those conditions are willing to submit the dispute to the Government board and abide by the decision, and they do abide by it. Does the Senator think that still the penalty which is inflicted by this proviso, if it may be called a penalty, ought to be inflicted?

Mr. THOMAS. It is inconceivable to me, Mr. President, that such a condition can arise at present, when employers are competing with each other for labor, and they are greatly afraid every day of a depletion in their already depleted ranks. But assuming such a condition to exist, I think that the agreement which was made here some time ago between the representatives of the employers and employees, as a result of which the Taft Industrial Board was created, should be respected by both sides, and that instead of striking in such an event the work should go on, production should continue, and that board should determine the whole business.

Mr. CUMMINS. There have been instances, though, in which the employer has refused to submit the dispute to the Government board, as I have been told.

Mr. THOMAS. It may be; but, if that is the case, the employer has violated the spirit of that understanding, and as a consequence he is the reprehensible party.

Mr. CUMMINS. My whole thought is this: While I agree with the Senator from Colorado that we must introduce a system through which men must either work productively in useful employment or, if fit physically, must enter the ranks of our fighting forces, we ought not at the same time to give to an avaricious and unfair employer an opportunity to use our necessity to impose hard conditions upon his employees.

Mr. THOMAS. I quite agree with that; but I put it to the Senator whether it is possible, where the demand for labor is so abnormally out of proportion to the supply, that any such dispute is likely to arise.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think, generally speaking, the Senator is right. There is a very great demand for labor; but, at the same time, there is a great difficulty which presents itself in a man skilled in one occupation passing from it to another, and becoming equally necessary in the different employment.

Mr. THOMAS. Frankly, I should like to see that transition from one employment to another prevented, because that is the crux of the whole situation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. THOMAS. A skilled man is so much in demand now that half a dozen employers want him. The result is that he goes from one to the other, because of superior inducements, and as a consequence he produces nothing.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely so. Now, I give the Senator an illustration that came to me the other day. I have it simply upon the representation of another. I have no personal knowledge of the facts.

There are some railroads in the country—a good many of them—that have been excluded from governmental control and possession, and over them the Government does not attempt to exercise any jurisdiction whatever. The employees of some of these roads, or at least one of them, as related to me, were denied even a portion of the privileges which had been extended to the employees of roads which had been taken over by the Government. They could not very well leave their employment. They had homes in the community. They were bound to it by a a great many ties. The Government could not do anything for them, and they considered the propriety of striking. Now, assuming that the employer in that instance was endeavoring to impose harsh and unfair conditions upon those employees, does the Senator think they ought to be taken from their deferred classes, if they were in deferred classes, without any opportunity whatever to submit to a Government tribunal the dispute which had arisen between them and the company which had employed them?

That is the only point which I think ought to be covered by this amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. To my certain knowledge, in addition to the Taft board, there are other boards. A very prominent citizen of my State, Mr. Verner Z. Reed, is a member of an industrial arbitration board which travels all over the country, at the behest of the Department of Labor, for the purpose of inquiring into and disposing of such difficulties and kindred ones. They have been very busy ever since their organization, something like a year ago.

The incident mentioned by the Senator from Iowa is akin to one which is now quite acute in my State. The Denver & Salt Lake Railroad, which is in the hands of a receiver, was taken over by the Government, and while the Government was operating the road the employees were assured of a raise in wages, retraoctive to the 1st of January last. While that assurance was pending the Government determined to abandon the road and turn it back to the receiver. The employees then demanded of the receiver this additional pay. The receiver had to reply that his road was bankrupt and that he could not do a thing. He was not to blame. It was a clear case of governmental dereliction. My last advices are that the road is tied up and the men have quit work. It is a road that is very necessary for the coal industry, and it means the decrease of our output of coal to a very material degree. I think the Government should keep its promise to those men, but I do not believe that the men should strike because up to this time it has not done so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very sure that the Government really failed in its obligation to the country in not keeping the railroad and controlling it in a proper way.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly; or at least in not keeping its promise.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I agree that these men, the operators upon the road or upon the road that I have in mind, which I will not mention, ought to continue in labor; but they ought to know and they ought to be assured that their dispute, which might ordinarily result in a strike, will be considered by the Government and that a decision will be made. It is in that respect largely that I think the amendment of the Senator from Colorado ought to be a little modified.

Mr. THOMAS. My impression is that if the existing arrangements of the Government for the settlement of threatened disputes, so as to avoid a strike, can not be made effective, it will be impossible for us to enact anything that will be effective.

Mr. CUMMINS. We can at least say that if the strikers are willing to submit to the decision of the Government and abide by it they shall not be penalized on account of it.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, I do not want to interfere with or in any manner imperil the absolute rights of the worker, except in so far as it may be necessary for the prosecution of this war. So far as that is concerned, the rights of the individual and injuries to the individual, wherever necessary, ought to be made subordinate to the supreme public necessity.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with that entirely. There may come a time when we will be compelled—and I am not sure that we are not approaching it—to invade the deferred classes or the postponed classes. Everything must give away to the supreme necessity. I do not want to be understood as in any way antagonizing that broad and just view of the matter.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the bill be read and that the committee amendments be considered as they are reached in the reading, and later other amendments may be considered.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GUION in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McCumber	Sheppard
Beckham	Guion	McKellar	Shields
Borah	Hale	McNary	Smith, Md.
Calder	Harding	Martin	Smith, Mich.
Chamberlain	Henderson	Nelson	Smoot
Colt	Johnson, Cal.	New	Sterling
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Sutherland
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Thomas
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Trammell
Dillingham	Kellogg	Poindexter	Vardaman
Fall	Kendrick	Pomerene	Watson
Fernald	Kenyon	Ransdell	Weeks
Fletcher	Kirby	Robinson	Wilfley
France	Knox	Saulsbury	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Shafroth

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is detained on official business.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Oregon asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the amendments of the committee be considered as they are reached in the reading. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and read to line 17, on page 2.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the chairman a question. I understand that just before the point of no quorum was made the chairman of the committee submitted a request that the committee amendments be considered first. The request was not put before the quorum was called for, and I wish to ask whether that request had been submitted to the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was put after the call for a quorum, and there was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not observe it. I intended to object to it, because I do not believe that arrangement ought to be made on bills of this kind. It is all right on appropriation bills. However, since the subject matter has been submitted, I do not know that I will make a point about it.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 2, line 24, before the word "occupations," to insert the word "industries," so as to read:

Persons engaged in industries, occupations, or employments found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, at this point I should like to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill. Would the word "occupations," in line 24, page 2, permit the Secretary of War to make regulations relieving the members of the police force in our several cities from the draft? I make the inquiry because I am in receipt of a letter from the mayor of the city of New York advising me that since the draft began over 700 members of the police force of that city have been taken and that before the end of the year at least 1,200 will be taken, and if this proposed law goes into effect he believes at least one-half of the police force of the city of New York will be required to go under the terms of the bill. Our legislature has passed a bill giving to the police and other employees of our cities full pay while they are away at the war, showing that they have determined to take care of them. I should like to know if the chairman of the committee believes that the word "occupations" used in the bill would give the Secretary of War the right to make regulations relieving various people like policemen from the draft.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know that it would. I do not think it would, and I do not think it ought to. That was not the purpose of the amendment in putting in the word "occupations."

Mr. CALDER. It would seem to me, if you read the whole paragraph, it would indicate that it would. It reads:

Persons engaged in industries, occupations, or employments found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think the amendment is broad enough to cover that.

Mr. CALDER. I wanted to get the opinion of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will examine the hearings on page 4, he will find the reasons given by the Provost Marshal General for adding the word "occupations" and changing a little the terminology of the first act.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Oregon that it ought not to include them, but the word "occupations" has a pretty broad meaning. If the policemenship of these men is not an occupation, what is it? I quite agree I do not suppose the Secretary of War would exercise it along that line, but I do not know how he would exclude them under that wording.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is barely possible that it might be done, but I know that was not in the contemplation of the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. How could the word "occupation" be construed to mean an official position? Is an official position of any kind an occupation?

Mr. BORAH. What is it if it is not an occupation?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not an occupation.

Mr. BORAH. What is it?

Mr. McCUMBER. An official position is not necessarily an occupation. There may be those who have no other occupation than running for office, but I do not think it is anywhere designated as an occupation.

Mr. BORAH. I think you will find it will cover it.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to suggest to the Senator from New York, as well as the Senator from Idaho, that the words "industries, occupations, or employments" are all qualified by the language found at the foot of page 2 and extending to page 3:

Persons engaged in industries, occupations, or employments found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.

It is all qualified by that language, so that we need not determine the question whether a policeman's duty is an occupation or an industry—whether it is an office or not. The question will be whether it has any bearing on the prosecution of the war. The whole thing is qualified by those phrases.

Mr. CALDER. The phrase "or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency"?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; the President will be the judge of that under this law.

Mr. BORAH. If the President should conclude that this particular office or position was an occupation and was not associated with the maintenance of the war, of course he could exclude it. Still it would come within his jurisdiction.

Mr. CALDER. I send this letter from the mayor to the Secretary's desk and ask to have it read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the Senator will yield, I will state that Gen. Crowder's explanation as to why the words "occupations or employment" are used will be found on page 4 of the hearings, volume 1. Gen. Crowder's explanation is as follows:

The next change I find in the existing law is on line 19, same page, where I undertake to substitute for the words "industries, including agriculture" which occur in the original bill, the words "occupations or employments." I want to say that in the administration of the selective-service law these words "industries, including agriculture," have caused considerable trouble. Some boards were disposed to give the words a very strict construction, particularly the New York City board, presided over by former Justice Hughes, assisted by former Attorney General Wickersham and Chief Justice Cullen of the Court of Appeals. That board adopted a definition of the word "industries" which excluded commerce, foreign and domestic.

* * * * * * * *

They excluded railroads in this country; they excluded banking, and we got out of that difficulty by defining the words in terms of inclusion. Their definition was followed to some extent by other boards, and has furnished a good deal of trouble.

Then he goes on:

There are various forms of quasi public employment that have to be reached in the future administration of this law. For instance, I can not classify a hospital as an industry, and yet I see the necessity of making deferments of forces of the various public hospitals throughout the country.

I think it comes within the jurisdiction of the board, the question whether or not they will exempt men on a police force.

Mr. BORAH. I find occupation is defined among other things as follows:

That to which one's time and attention are habitually devoted; habitual or stated employment; vocation; calling; trade; business.

The synonyms which are given include occupation, work, calling, vocation, profession, or office. I do not think there is any doubt about its covering the office.

Mr. CALDER. I ask to have the letter I sent to the desk read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

CITY OF NEW YORK,
OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
August 9, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM M. CALDER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor to invite your attention to conditions now confronting the administration of police affairs in the city of New York by reason of the drafts upon members of the police force under existing and proposed military draft laws. The existing law calls all members of the police force from 21 to 31 to the colors. All the men on the existing civil-service list are of conscription age, and, consequently, should they be appointed they become almost immediately a liability upon the city, without having rendered any appreciable service.

Already more than 700 men have been drafted, and before the end of this year at least 1,000 will have been drafted into the military service, and ultimately 28 per cent of the entire force, or 3,000 men, will be called.

Should the Government raise the draft age to 45 years, virtually every able-bodied policeman in this city will be, sooner or later, taken into the Army. Policemen of this city physically fit will be called before civilians with dependents, because they can not claim exemption from a monetary standpoint, since, under the provisions of the Fenner law, the city pays them the difference between the salary they get as policemen and the salary they get as members of the Army.

An efficient policeman can not be made in a brief period; a year or two is required to bring about this result. If we are to be compelled to recruit the police force of this city, in this most trying period of its history, from the utterly green and perhaps thoroughly undesirable material left over from the draft, we are courting disaster.

The possibility of disorder, due to labor unrest; the fomenting of disturbance by enemy alien elements; possible uprising against authority, due to dissatisfaction with the war or the Government by reason of insufficient, improper, or unacceptable food, or due to the high cost of food and clothing, or increased burdens, may, under certain circumstances, burst into an appalling reality.

The arguments advanced that no exception can be made in New York City regarding drafting of policemen, because to do so would mean that every other city in the country would be justified in making similar demands, should have no weight. New York City is in a class by itself. It is the financial center of the world; from it radiates all activities looking toward the speedy and satisfactory conclusion of the war. This is not true of any other city in this country. Riots or disturbances in this city improperly handled and ineffectively quelled would be a national disaster that would be pleasing to the enemy and would certainly demand the attention of the Government.

New York is the gateway of American commerce; it is the pulse of this hemisphere, and from it is judged the Nation's vigor and determination. It is unthinkable that the police force of this city should be otherwise than up to the highest standard in these momentous times, when unprecedented emergencies are bound to arise.

Moreover, the city of New York is made up of many foreign elements. At least 75,000 enemy aliens, male and female, and hundreds of thousands of citizens of the Teutonic race, against whom demonstrations may be expected under certain conditions, make up a considerable part of our cosmopolitan population.

The war activities in this city, and our cooperation with the Federal Government, has made unusual demands upon the police force of this city. To make further inroads upon this very much depleted force, which may not be recruited with proper material, is a matter worthy of serious consideration.

I therefore feel it is my duty to request the Representatives of this city and State in Congress to secure such modification of the existing statutes as will meet this very important and dangerous condition, for I am certain it can not be to the best interest of the Government, considering all New York City means to the Nation, to destroy or seriously restrict the efficiency of the police force of this city. A policeman can render much better service to the Government by good police duty in this city than he can by entering the military service.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN F. HYLAN, Mayor.

Mr. CALDER. I believe myself that the word "occupations" in the bill covers the situation fully. If it did not I would offer an amendment to cover it. From New York City goes at least 60 per cent of our Army supplies sent abroad and at least 70 per cent of our troops. I agree with the mayor that this law should be so framed as to permit us to keep our efficient police force if in the judgment of the War Department it should be kept.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it seems to me that there is a little confusion here between the right to classify and put certain persons in deferred classifications and the right to exclude entirely from the operation of the draft. This paragraph is intended to give to the President the right to remove certain persons or certain occupations entirely from the operation of the draft, not merely to classify them so that they will be in the first, second, or third class. I am very much opposed to giving the President the right to exclude anybody from the operations of the draft law as a class. I think the point is of a good deal more importance than we realized a moment ago, when it was called to our attention. The original draft law provided:

And the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes: County and municipal officials.

I think that is indefensible. Why should county and municipal officials be excluded under any circumstances from the operations of the draft? I can see how a particular county official or a particular municipal official ought to be placed in a deferred class, but there is no reason on earth for giving the President the power to exclude them as a class. Then we have customhouse clerks, clerks employed by the United States in the transportation of mail, and so forth. Under that law the Provost Marshal General placed them in class 3. It did not exclude from the draft. Mark you, the President has never excluded these people from the operations of the draft, and I think he never will, because it is plainly against public policy to do so; but the Provost Marshal General placed in class 3 highly trained policemen at least three years in the service of the municipality. That may be very right.

I realize, of course, that protection should not be withdrawn from the city of New York. There should always be an adequate police force there for the preservation of order, and to meet that the Provost Marshal General has put the policemen answering these qualifications in the third class. There is no likelihood that the third class will in any approximate time at any rate be called for military service.

The bill we have before us provides:

That the provision of section 4 of said act—

And what I quoted was from section 4—

That the provision of section 4 of said act, "persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency," be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"Persons engaged in industries, occupations, or employments, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency."

I am very sorry that the power of the administration to exclude entirely from the operation of the draft is enlarged so as to include persons who are named in this part of the bill. I think the country ought to have the opportunity to draw from all these classes. There may be very good reason for saying that this man shall be drawn last, but there can not be any reason for saying that this man shall not be drawn at all.

While I do not propose any change in the report of the committee in this respect, I feel that it is entering upon rather a dangerous field.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 2, line 25, after the word "employment," to insert the words "including agriculture."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 3, after the word "emergency," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That when any person shall have been placed in a deferred or exempted class for any of the reasons in this paragraph set forth, he shall not be entitled to remain therein unless he shall in good faith continue, while physically able so to do, to work at and follow such occupation, employment, or business, and if he fails so to do he shall again become subject to the draft. The President shall make regulations for enforcing this provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment to the committee amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 9, in the committee amendment, after the word "business," it is proposed to insert the following: "or some other productive occupation, employment, or business deemed necessary hereunder."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as I read the amendment of the committee, the deferred classification is forfeited in the event that the person so classified fails to work at or to follow the occupation, employment, or business in which he was engaged at the time of the classification. If the drafted man seeking exemption and given the deferred classification passes from one necessary employment to another and is so engaged, thus rendering his country exactly the same service and as valuable service as he did or was doing at the time of his exemption or of his being placed in a deferred class, there is no reason in the world why his privilege, whatever it may be, should be forfeited. The amendment which I have offered to the committee amendment is solely for the purpose of enlarging the description in the committee amendment so that if the man is in a productive and necessary employment, so decided by the board or by whatever authority decides such questions, he shall not lose his classification.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator that the amendment of the committee go over for the present. It is being discussed by some members of the Military Committee, who are absent on that account, and we can take it up a little later. I ask that the amendment be passed over at present.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have another amendment——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the committee amendment and also the amendment suggested by the Senator to this provision be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is made to pass over the amendment of the committee without prejudice.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. My request is that the so-called "work-or-fight" amendment, with the amendment proposed to it by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] may temporarily go over.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is quite agreeable to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may make the suggestion, I understand that the Senator from Iowa has another amendment to this amendment which he desires to offer.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have an amendment in addition to the one which I have just offered, but it is an amendment with regard to the application of the amendment in cases of strike.

Mr. POMERENE. Is there any objection to the Senator offering the amendment now, so that it may be printed in the RECORD for the information of Senators?

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendment has been printed.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment, which has just been passed over, and I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, on page 3, line 12, as follows:

3. That section 4 of said act be amended by adding at the end thereof the following proviso:

"Provided, That nothing in this section contained shall prevent the President, if he deems it advisable, from appointing as a member of a local board any person residing outside the subdivision or area in which such local board has jurisdiction, or from transferring a member of one local board to another local board outside the subdivision or area in which such person resides."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I think as printed in the bill the provision is incorrect. As I understand the report of the committee, there were certain words inserted in this clause which do not appear in this print. Therefore, in order to make the language accord with the report of the committee, I move that the words which I send to the desk be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 17, after the word "area," it is proposed to insert the words "but within the same State."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from New Jersey is perfectly correct in stating that the language which he suggests as an amendment was agreed upon in the committee, but somehow or other it was omitted from the bill as it has been printed. It is, however, in the terms of the bill as printed in the report.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, where does the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey come in—after the word "advisable," on page 3, line 15?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; after the word "area," in line 17. I will explain the amendment to the Senator, if he wishes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desired to understand where the amendment was proposed to be inserted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the purport of this language is to permit the President in the selection of members for the local boards to take them from areas outside of the local subdivisions, as provided in the original law. In the selection of local boards the President was limited to a subdivision of a county or to an area containing 30,000 inhabitants. It was provided that the President should select the members of such boards from the local authorities. The pending bill provides that he may go to areas outside of the subdivision and select men for service upon boards in districts of which they are not residents. The reason given for that by Gen. Crowder was as follows:

> The effect of that proviso is to make it legal to appoint as a member of a local board a person residing outside of the area of that board or for members of boards to exchange services. We started in the administration of this law by localizing its administration and making a residential requirement for membership on the board.

I want the Senate to realize the effect of this provision. I reserved a right in committee to move to strike it out. I am not going to make that motion, but I wish the Senate to understand that the provision in the bill will permit the President, through the governors of the States, to appoint as members of the local boards men who are total strangers to the locality where they may serve. The idea in the original act was to select men in a district who were conversant with the condition of the men drafted in that district—their neighbors and friends—and thus throw around the selection of those men a certain confidence and security. I do not believe that the President, or Gen. Crowder representing him, is going to radically change the local boards; but in certain districts it is claimed that they can not get proper men to serve on the boards, and in certain other districts that they can not get anyone to serve on them. So Gen. Crowder has asked for authority to go outside of the various subdivisions in selecting members for local boards. This is proposed in order to correct the abuses which have crept into the drafting or conscription system. At first I felt that I would move to strike out the provision, but I feel the necessity of finding men to serve on these boards who will properly administer the law is so great that I have decided not to do so. I wish, however, the Senate to understand the purport of the provision reported by the committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, with all due deference to the opinion expressed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], I do not believe that the President would be authorized to appoint any other than a citizen and resident of a given State to membership on a local board in that State. As I understand the purpose of this provision, it is simply to authorize a change of the membership of the local boards within a State, so that the department may meet the difficulty which they have encountered in some States in getting men at all who are competent to serve.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to ask the Senator from Oregon if there is lurking around in this proposed legislation the fear that local officials will not properly enforce the law?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There were some instances given, which were not made a matter of record, where in some districts in the larger cities the department has been absolutely unable to find men who were competent to serve at all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. "Competent to serve?"

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They are absolutely not competent to serve.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yet all of those communities elect Members of the House of Representatives; they elect Members of the Senate; and every one of them has a voice in the choice of the President of the United States. I think that the provision involves a very uncalled-for reflection upon the intelligence of the various communities in the country. I do not mean that the Senator from Oregon intentionally reflects upon them, but I refer to the motive back of this proposed legislation. If there is any one thing that ought to be done with a reasonable degree of domestic and local sympathy, it is the drafting of soldier boys whose hearts are torn by the stress of war and who are ready and anxious to do their duty in this crisis. No pressure is necessary from outsiders; they have responded and others are ready to go where duty calls without hesitation or complaining. Surely, local boards can and will execute the law without any assistance from strangers.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I say to the Senator from Michigan that a few instances were given which showed that such a provision is necessary if we are to have any boards at all? I think there were some instances given—the Senator may imagine such cases—where the local boards did not want to enforce the draft act at all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I presume there is some ground for that statement or the Senator from Oregon would not make it, but such instances must be very rare.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. I should like to know if any of those instances have occurred in county units?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think not. I do not recall any such.

Mr. FALL. Then why not apply this proposed change simply to cities or to localities of over 30,000 inhabitants outside of the county units? So far as I am familiar with conditions, particularly in the western section of the country, it does not appeal to my reason at all to say that county officials, who are elected by the people, are not capable of acting on local boards, although I can understand where in a city of four or five hundred thousand or a million inhabitants it might be very well to allow the President to transfer a member of a local board from one 30,000 unit to another 30,000 unit in the same political unit.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, what are Senators to do who vote for this kind of an amendment? Are they to acknowledge that there are communities in their own States which have not sufficient intelligence and patriotism to enforce this proposed law? Are we to impugn the patriotic motives of the people of our own States by saying that some one shall be brought in from the outside who will not be influenced by local conditions and by old friendships to enforce the law?

Mr. President, I think this is the most outrageous reflection imaginable upon the patriotism and intelligence of local communities. I would not any more vote for it than I would vote personally to indict strangers against whom nothing has been said. I want some one to approach the families of the people of my State who have an interest in those families.

I do not want strangers to come in, without sympathy, and undertake to chill the heart throbs of women who are about to lose their boys to the Army. I do not agree with the committee. I think this plan is wholly unwarranted; I think it is a sad reflection upon the various communities of the country. I would not even inject such a rule on the State of Mississippi. I would not even do it there, much less will I permit it to be done in my State. I want no one from North Carolina or South Carolina or Mississippi to come into Michigan to administer the draft law. We will administer the draft law ourselves. I mean no reflection upon those States. They would not want anyone from Michigan to go down there to enforce the draft law in North Carolina.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Unless it should happen to be the Senator himself. We would have no objection to him.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I thank the Senator from Mississippi. Senators who are about to retire from the Senate have a singular affection for one another. [Laughter.]

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish my good friend, the Senator, to understand that that expression was not born of the fellow feeling which makes us "wondrous kind." It was rather my admiration for the Senator and my knowledge of his sense of fairness that caused me to make the observation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President, I know how kindly the Senator from Mississippi is, and I know, too, that he has shown as much courage as any man who ever sat in this Chamber since I have been here, and he has been as discriminating and as fair, and, in my judgment, his heart beats with the truest loyalty to the flag and to the country. I do not intend to criticize him, but if anyone thinks he is going to get my vote for an amendment that will permit a stranger to be brought into my community to enforce the draft law he is mistaken. I want no strangers there for such purpose; I want a neighbor, a friend, a sympathizer, a kindly person whom I have known to undertake the enforcement of the draft, and it will be obeyed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator understands that the privilege of transferring members of local boards is limited to the confines of the State?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; it is supposed to be so limited, but my honored friend, the Senator from New Jersey, was so uncertain about the matter that he offered an amendment which would make the language plain.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The provision reported by the committee originally limited the changes that might be made on the local boards to residents of the particular State.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know how it is going to be administered, but I know there are enough strangers running around this country wearing badges and in some sort of roving employment by the Government to make a formidable addition to the American Army in France. I do not want strangers to come to Michigan to enforce our draft laws. There is not a community in my State, from the Canadian border to the Indiana line, that is not competent, perfectly willing, and desirous of enforcing this law, and enforcing it properly, and we do not need to import intelligent strangers from anywhere to do it. Michigan is in this war to the finish. Yes; a military victory alone will satisfy us, and our beloved boys are ready and waiting to help win such a victory even at the sacrifice of their young and promising lives. No force is necessary to get the sons of Michigan, who are in great numbers now upon every battle field.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey let me ask him where is the provision in the bill which limits the power of transferring members from one local board to another to residents of the particular State?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It was in the original print, and I have just offered an amendment limiting it to the confines of each State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Limiting the power of transferring members of local boards to residents of the respective States?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is not in the bill as reported.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is not in the Senate print.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I say for the committee that this very subject was under discussion in the committee for some time. If Senators will look at the report which was filed, they will see the bill as it was agreed upon by the committee printed in full in that report. The section under consideration confines the power given to make changes in the local boards to citizens residing within the confines of the respective States; but somehow or other in printing the bill to be placed on the desks of Senators separate from the report those few words were omitted. Now the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has moved to insert those words which will carry out exactly that portion of the bill as it was agreed to by the committee.

With reference to the statement of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], it sounds all right to say that this thing ought not to be done, and I am in accord with the Senator's views. I would not want anybody to come from an outside State to my State for the purpose of administering the draft act, nor does this provision intend to allow that to be done.

It is all right for the Senator to talk about communities being able to conduct their own affairs and being intelligent enough to vote and to elect Representatives in Congress and other public officials; but it is a well-known fact that there are some communities in the larger cities of the country, where the area is contracted, where the population is dense, and where there are so many foreigners that this work can not be done. It is only to meet that condition that the provision has been inserted in the bill. I do not want to be invidious in picking out any particular city, but there are some cities where the foreign element constitutes a local draft area and where the men can not speak a word of English or read a word of English, while right across the street some business man may be competent to do the work. The purpose of the provision was largely to meet that condition. Those cases were cited by the Provost Marshal General, but feeling the same delicacy about it that I do now he asked that that portion of his statement be not printed in the record. I will be glad, however, to inform the Senator as to some of the cities where this condition has been found to exist.

That is one condition. Conditions developed in some portions of the country—and I am glad to say that they are very few and far between—which showed that the local board was opposed to the whole system, and it was hardly fair to other portions of the State, and it was not fair to the State of the Senator from Michigan that such a board should be permitted to exempt every registered man who came before it on the theory that they were opposed to the draft law. The provision was designed to meet those conditions. The Provost Marshal General says they are not frequent, but there are some districts where the population is dense, where the area is small, and where the foreign population is great, where it is hard to find anybody to do the work efficiently.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will allow me, I think that under such conditions as he describes in a specified area, where the English language is not spoken, and where it is impossible to arrive at a fair understanding, the authorities might have the right to deputize some one from an adjoining subdivision, but this proposed legislation, if passed, will open the door to strangers administering the law in local communities. I think that is really at the bottom of this thing, although I do not wish to question the statement of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I know the Senator wants to be perfectly fair about this matter. If he will take the proposed amendment in connection with the original draft act, which was approved on the 18th of May, 1917, he will see there is no danger of that situation arising. For instance, the original draft act, on page 4, provides:

Such boards—

That is, the local boards—

shall be appointed by the President and shall consist of three or more members, none of whom shall be connected with the Military Establishment, to be chosen from among the local authorities of such subdivisions or from other citizens residing in the subdivision or area in which the respective boards will have jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President.

It will be seen that the membership of the local boards is confined absolutely to residents of the respective draft districts or subdivisions. The only purpose of the provision reported by the committee is to enable the President or the Provost Marshal General to transfer a member of one local board to another local board to meet the very condition which I have described.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. When we started out with the original draft bill it was supposed we were going to be confronted with riots, and so forth, at every turn. It was even prophesied here that it would not work; that it was contrary to the spirit of American institutions; that it was unnecessary, and there were very unusual forebodings as to the working of the draft law. Yet, notwithstanding all that was said, the draft law has worked well. It has fallen alike upon all classes of our citizenship. It is perhaps the most effective, fair, and just plan under which an army could be raised. Most communities have fallen in with it readily. I passed an humble cottage the other day in my State where there were five stars on the service flag, and there was no criticism of the law. I passed a mansion not far from the cottage to which I have just referred where there were also five stars on the service flag. The first one of those stars represented Stewart Edward White, the author and hunter, and the others his younger brothers, every one of whom is now in the service.

I do not want to get very far afield from the proposition upon which we are now passing, but I am not willing by my vote to indict any community in any part of the United States for lack of patriotism or lack of intelligence or lack of desire properly to enforce the draft law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If I should say such a thing about one community, somebody else might, with the same lack of information, say it about my own State. I want these unusual, extraordinary laws enforced by local citizens who know their neighbors, know how their hearts ache and can sympathize with them and yet enforce the law. I do not want a man to take up this rule and apply it and then jump in his automobile and whirl away without the least particle of sympathy for those he has left behind. I think that is going to be the effect of this amendment. Take the State constabulary of Pennsylvania. Probably there is no constabulary in the entire country as efficient as the State constabulary of Pennsylvania. The members of that constabulary, strangers, come into a community to enforce what? Criminal laws; to hunt down the murderer and the thief. I do not care if the officer does not waste much sympathy over that type of offender. But here is a boy drawn from school to be placed where his life is in peril. He is perfectly willing to give it, and his family are willing that he should give it, and yet it is proposed to bring in strangers from other States to enforce that kind of a law. I do not believe it is necessary, and I will not vote for it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think there is another reason that should be given in support of this amendment, and that is to secure uniformity of rule throughout the several districts. I have received letters even from my own State and from other States complaining of this lack of uniformity, stating that in certain counties the rule of exemption is most liberal and in other counties it is most stringent. Where a condition of that character existed in one county the Senator might find four or five stars, indicating the number of boys taken from a single family, while in another subdivision he might find a family of the same kind, and practically of the same conditions, where there might be only one star or no stars. Therefore, while I would not go outside of the State, I think it would be very well if within the State itself the members from one county or one subdivision who had been sitting and passing upon exemptions might visit and sit with a board in another section, to the end that the same rules should apply to every section of the same State. I do not understand that this is intended to go outside of the State, but, on the contrary, it is to be wholly within the State.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The language of this amendment does not justify the Senator in assuming that the important official is only going in for council. He goes in to superintend and supervise, and his word is law.

Mr. McCUMBER. I referred to an exchange. You take a man from a section that has been especially liberal and send him to another section where the rule against excuses is rather stringent; you send a man from a county in which they have applied a stringent rule and allow him to sit with the others in a county where the rule has been liberal, and the tendency on both sides is to equalize and to secure uniformity of the rule. I think good will come from it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, before the Senator from North Dakota takes his seat I should like to ask him a question. Can not that uniformity of decision be obtained by an appeal, and was not that the object of the provision for appeal, and also the provision for allowing the President to modify or reverse the decision?

Mr. McCUMBER. The appeal would apply to the person who was dissatisfied because he was taken. The appeal would scarcely arise in a case where a person desired to be exempted, and the board was most liberal in allowing him to be exempted.

Mr. KELLOGG. If that is the case, then, if this amendment was intended to accomplish what the Senator from North Dakota says, it would not be confined to the field in which it was intended to operate, because the exchange would have to be so general throughout the country between communities as to mix the boards all up and make uniformity of decision impossible. The object here, as I understand it, is simply to relieve certain local communities where the draft law is not fairly administered, and a very few of those. The Senator will recollect that when the original draft bill was before the Senate it contained no clause for local boards, and there was great opposition to the bill on that account, and opposition to allowing it to be administered by Army officers; and for that reason the local boards were provided for, and the Military Establishment excluded from the personnel of those boards. It seems to me that the Military Establishment should be excluded in this amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is nothing in the amendment itself which destroys the local board. It simply provides that in proper and just cases some one serving upon another board may serve upon this local board, and an exchange thus be made. I do not understand that that would in any way destroy or affect the localization of influence or action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask that the amendment may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 17, after the word "area," it is proposed to insert the words "but within the same State."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have a still further amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 16, after the word "person," it is proposed to insert the words "not connected with the Military Establishment."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that I will not object to that, because under my view of the matter it is already in the law.

Mr. NELSON. It is in the law already.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But, as I read this amendment, while the original section of the bill has this prohibition, this amendment says "any person," and would evidently nullify the original prohibition against anyone connected with the Military Establishment serving on these boards. I think it is just as safe to have this amendment made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the Secretary read to the end of section 4, on page 5, line 16.

The SECRETARY. At this point, on page 5, after line 16, the committee proposes to insert the following:

5. The wife of a soldier or sailor serving in the present war——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon if there has not been an amendment offered to the section that has just been read?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not yet.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I believe the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] has an amendment to that section.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Amendments are not in order yet. The Secretary is just reading the bill, and the committee amendments are being considered first.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] submitted an amendment to that particular section. I do not think it was formally offered; but he gave notice of it, and had it read.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. At his request it lay on the table, and I assume it will come up when the amendments are reached.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume that must be passed on before the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This is not a committee amendment, Mr. President. This is the bill as reported from the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Then it is all right. I was under the impression that that particular phraseology was a committee amendment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Then the question of the age limit is not before the Senate at this time? If it is, I desire to notify the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], who introduced the amendment and whom I wish to have present when the vote is taken.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon, in charge of the bill, whether the designation "the wife of a soldier or sailor serving in the present war" includes the marines? If not, I think it ought to be added.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That amendment has not been read yet, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The whole amendment has not yet been read.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I heard the first two lines read, and that is what caused me to make the inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, after line 16, the committee proposes to insert the following:

The wife of a soldier or sailor serving in the present war shall not be disqualified for any position under the Government because she is a married woman.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, I will state, in answer to the Senator's question, that the committee thought that language was broad enough to cover all of them—both the Marine Corps, the men in the Navy, and the men in the Army.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I suggest an amendment, by inserting after the word "sailor," on line 17, page 5, the word "while," so as to read:

The wife of a soldier or sailor while serving in the present war shall not be disqualified—

And so forth.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The wife while serving or the soldier while serving?

Mr. THOMAS. The expression may not be absolutely clear. I think it is. My purpose is to limit the removal of this disqualification to the condition of actual service.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, he certainly would not want to limit the removal of the disqualification so as to preclude a woman whose husband has served in the war, and who has been so injured that he can not continue to serve, from taking Government employment; and yet that is exactly what his amendment would do if agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, it might have that effect.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Or who has been killed.

Mr. ROBINSON. If he is killed, she is no longer a wife; she is a widow.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, inasmuch as there is some objection to the amendment I have suggested, I will not insist upon it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to know, so that I can reflect upon the subject—it is a very important matter—what positions under the Government, by any law or rule, are forbidden to married women simply because they are married?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I will attempt to answer, but upon information. My information is that under civil-service rules and regulations married women are disqualified from practically all civil-service positions; the idea being that preference should be given to unmarried women, who have to support themselves and who have no husbands to support them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask the question purely for information. I did not know that the Government excluded any married woman from a position simply because she was married.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand that the amendment was offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. CUMMINS. It may be so. I have no information on the subject.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, how far these regulations go I am not prepared to say; but I am informed that there are certain departments of the Government where a woman who is married to a man in the Government service is not permitted to be employed, and that in some of these departments they have construed service in the Army and Navy as employment, and that accordingly there are cases where the wife of a soldier or of a sailor has been refused employment, not because she is not competent but because her husband is in the Government service. With that in view, I wrote this amendment. I did not have the time to investigate as to the extent of the present practice; but I felt very sure that the Congress would not permit any woman to be barred from Government work at a time like this merely because her husband was serving in the Army or Navy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator has the information a little mixed. The rule is this—and it applies only to a very few of the departments of our Government—that where the husband is an employee of the Government under the civil service his wife shall not be employed in that department under that same service. That rule would not apply to a case like this, because the soldier is not in the civil service, but of course he is in the employment of the Government. I think it is unnecessary, if that is the reason of the amendment, because I want to say to the Senator that that only applies to employees who are employed under the civil service.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the Senator probably is in error. Whether he is or not, I should like to have this amendment in the bill for the sake of fixing the status.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the amendment is not agreed to, it would be in the power of any department to deprive the wife of a soldier of the opportunity to enter the service. If the amendment is agreed to, it would not be within its power to do so. I think it entirely improbable that any such discrimination would be made, but still the amendment will serve a useful purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I was not speaking as to whether the amendment should be adopted or whether it should not be adopted. I am not opposed to the amendment. My intention was simply to call attention to the fact that there was such a rule as suggested by the Senator, but that it applied only to employees who were employed under the civil service, and also only to a limited number of the departments.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the subsection now being discussed, as follows: After the word "woman," on line 19, page 5, add these words:

And the civil-service laws shall not apply to such persons.

Mr. REED. I accept that amendment, and I should like to have the amendment accepted by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator not to accept it. I am very much in favor of the amendment as it stands, but I should not like to see it modified as suggested by the Senator from Tennessee. I should like to have a separate vote on it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I should like to consent to the request of the Senator from Missouri to accept that amendment, but I think it would be a disaster. There is no telling how many married men there may be in the service, and there are many splendid women who would not be capable of doing the work in these departments or in any Government position; and I do not think it ought to the added to this clause of the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I think this is a very meritorious amendment. This law, when passed, will take to France many citizens of this country who will leave wives at home; and there ought to be no technical bar to their wives, while remaining at home, supporting their families through the public service. Every Senator in this Chamber knows that the civil-service law is administered along technical lines; that the examinations are very technical and include many matters which have no application or reference to the position which the applicant seeks to obtain. Furthermore, the applicants under that law are limited to persons under 45 years of age, which will also bar some. But the great trouble in getting into the service as provided by this subsection 5 is that they will be required to take an examination in regard to technical matters. Many of these women have been out of school for years. They can not stand a school examination as now required by the Civil Service Commission. Many men can not do it, and to require them to take such an examination is practically barring them from the service. This subsection might as well be left out unless the civil-service examination requirement is suspended. I think, in behalf of these married women, that this subsection ought to be adopted and the civil-service law ought to be suspended as to them while their husbands are in a foreign land fighting for their country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Tennessee if he would relieve them entirely from examination under civil-service rules?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; I would give them the amplest opportunity to enter the service and make a living for their families.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not the question. The question is this: If a soldier's wife seeks to enter Government employment, either in Washington or otherwise, would the Senator dispense entirely with all examination as to her competency and fitness for the particular position for which she applies?

Mr. SHIELDS. Why, certainly not as to all examinations. The officer to whom they apply would see that they are competent to discharge their duties; but I would exempt them from any jurisdiction or dominion of the civil-service law as it is now being administered.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator's amendment would relieve them from any examination whatever.

Mr. SHIELDS. There are thousands of young women in Washington right now who have never passed any civil-service examination; and why not put these mothers of families, mothers of soldiers, in a status where they can make a living?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether, in the event his amendment is adopted, the beneficiary of the amendment will continue to receive the money which she now receives from the Government because she is the wife of a soldier?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly. I want to help them, not to diminish their ability to make a living.

Mr. THOMAS. In other words, to the $30 a month, or thereabouts, which she now receives, one-half of which comes from the Treasury, the Senator would add the salary which as an officeholder the married woman would draw?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly, if she performs labor for the Government of a value that entitles her to receive it. I do not want any law to require these women who want to work to remain idle, to sit in their houses with folded hands. Let us give them a chance to make a living. If they render full value in the service to the Government they are not pensioners. They are not subjects of charity. They are entitled to compensation for their work regardless of their means or regardless of whatever allowances they get from the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I think the Senator's amendment should be entitled "An act to encourage the marriage of young women with soldiers in the United States Army."

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand now that marriage is being encouraged all over the United States and all over the world, and I am in favor of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the proposed amendment of the committee, after the words "married woman," on line 19, page 5, it is proposed to insert:

And the civil-service laws shall not apply to such persons.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment. I do not know that I can get them, but I call for them. I should like to see a record vote on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion. I am inclined to think there may be some misapprehension about the effect of this amendment.

Of course, the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] does not mean that a person shall be employed, whether competent or incompetent. There is nothing in the amendment to compel the employment of any incompetent person, or to compel the employment of any person. It only provides that no person who is the wife of a soldier or sailor shall be barred by virtue of marriage, and it further provides that they shall not be barred by any civil-service examination or rule; but they would nevertheless have to satisfy their employer as to their reasonable competency or he would not employ them, for there is nothing to compel him to employ them. They are now employing thousands, having waived the civil-service rule.

Now, just one moment. I shall not detain you long.

We have now under arms, or will have by the 1st of October, substantially 3,000,000 men in the Army, 500,000 in the Navy, and three hundred and odd thousand in the Marine Corps, giving us an Army approximating 4,000,000. These are from the younger men of the country. The new draft will raise, in my judgment, two and a quarter million more; so that it may be said that we will have drawn from the male population substantially 6,000,000 men by this time next year. I said yesterday that I believe we will go beyond that, but I do not pause to consider that.

When you have taken 6,000,000 men out of the vocations of life which they have heretofore followed, you will need every woman you can get in the service of the country, either of the Government or the business and industrial concerns of the land.

If anyone desires to limit this amendment to the period of the war, I should not object, because I believe when the war is over the wives of these men will be taken care of, but I think there is no danger in this amendment. It will not break down the civil-service rules. It will simply mean that if a man goes into this war his wife will not be obliged to sit at home and nurse her hands and become a partial charge on the community; that when there is a Government position open that she is able to fill she will not be barred from that position.

Mr. President, there are many hardships being undergone to-day. There is many a man who could have had exemption who was either too patriotic or too proud to ask it. There is many a man who was earning a thousand or two thousand or even five or six thousand dollars a year who is to-day drawing from the Government $30 a month, and whose family prior to this war lived, if not in luxury, at least in a condition of entire comfort; and to-day the women, who have sealed their lips and uttered no complaint, scarcely know how they are to continue to live on the poor stipend the Government gives.

For the wife of a man who is standing in the battle front or the wife of a man who is upon the deck of a vessel of war there ought to be no bar to preferment by any law or regulation or rule. She ought not to be compelled to go into competition with some young lady clerk fresh from a university, but should be allowed a place under the Government which her husband is imperiling his life to preserve if her education is superior to that of the young lady who has no husband, perhaps no father or brother, in the war.

I am in favor of the amendment as offered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not want to utter a single word in disparagement of the soldier or his wife, and I am painfully aware of the fact that any opposition to legislation which is intended to benefit that class of our people may be so construed. But I think that we are beginning, by what is now proposed, a career of legislation the effect of which will be to very largely discriminate against those who stay at home, whether they are eligible for military service or not, whether they have been kept at home because they can be of greater service at home than they can be upon the front, or not, and will find its fruitage in the millions upon millions of dollars which we are expending in pensions, a list which is growing as the old participants in the Civil War are becoming less and less in number.

Mr. President, the Government of the United States is doing more for the soldiers and sailors and the families of the soldiers than any other nation in the world is doing or ever has done. We pay, it is true, comparatively speaking, a small reward to the private soldier; but we give him the opportunity, of which he avails himself, of a very liberal system of insurance, and we add to the one-half of his salary which he is required to send or which he does send to his family an additional equal amount, plus added amounts for children, if there be any. The burden which that places upon the Treasury of the United States is enormous. We pay it gladly; it ought to be done; but it is now proposed to give the wife of the soldier an unusual privilege because her husband is serving the country at the front. The inspiration is a noble one and the purpose is entitled to due and creditable consideration.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has just given us an approximate estimate of the number of soldiers we will have at the front very soon. It is safe to say that 50 per cent of them may be married men. As a result there will be a new army of would-be officeholders created in the United States, some two million in number, and I think in excess of the total amount of our civil service now, although it has been greatly expanded.

It is true, Mr. President, that many of these soldiers have given up compensation in civil life very much in excess of the amounts which they are receiving in the service, but it is equally true that many of them have no one dependent upon them in the sense that dependency is used in the statute and whose wives are much better off than many good women anxious to serve the Government and needing the compensation as a means of livelihood. This is discriminating against the woman, in my judgment who is working for the Government wherever she can but who is without a husband and may need the compensation that she can secure under the civil service.

It is not the young lady fresh from a university in whose behalf I am speaking, but that great army of dependent women who are entitled to due consideration by this great Government of the United States, notwithstanding the fact that they have no husbands or their husbands may not be at the front. Many of them have sons at the front. This privilege is not extended to them. Many of them have brothers at the front. It is not extended to them, but it exalts the wives of the soldiers into a specific and favored class. The result of such legislation will, in my judgment, be to greatly injure an equally reputable class of women in this country who are entitled to consideration notwithstanding the fact that they are not the wives of soldiers.

I hope this amendment will be rejected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it seems to me there is another matter to which should be given consideration in discussing the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, and that is Government efficiency. If there is anything we are striving for in the present war it is to mobilize the energies of the United States and secure efficiency, and one of the most important factors in securing efficiency has been the civil-service law of the United States.

It is not popular, particularly among politicians. I have heard it denounced very frequently in the cloakroom. Senators who have favorites for whom they want positions, public men generally, politicians who want to resume the old practice of favoritism in giving Government employment to men and women, abhor the civil-service law. But the civil-service law of the United States has exalted the public service. It has brought decency into Washington life. It has brought efficiency into the Government offices. Though it is not yet a perfect system, it is so far superior to the old system of favoritism that I for one am strongly opposed to any attack upon it, even though the attack be in the guise of an attempt to help the wives of the soldiers in the war.

Mr. President, there are not very many wives in the United States who can come to Washington for the service of the Government. There are not many wives who care to leave their homes and their families to come here, and Washington is the chief place where such positions as these might be offered. It will simply be the beginning, if we adopt this amendment, of an attempt to break down the civil-service law.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator if it is not possible that the wives will not have to come to Washington?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I say you are holding forth false hopes to them, and those wives who do come here will discover that they have separated themselves from their families and, in some cases, separated themselves from their children and come to a place where the cost of living will more than eat up all they get out of it, and they will be disappointed.

The first effect of it will be an assault upon the civil-service law of the United States, and I am opposed to it for that reason. It is true there are some women whose husbands have gone into the war who have been compelled to go into civil employment, and civil employment is open to them. There has never been a time in the United States when it was so easy for women to find employment as it is now in civil lines of life. In professions, in merchandizing, in industries, there never was a time when women could earn so much and secure work so easily.

I am opposed to this proposed amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, first, because it is an attack upon the civil-service law in the guise of assisting the wives of soldiers, and, second, because it is holding out a false hope in offering an unnecessary inducement to women who already find abundant employment in the world of industries in the land.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I desire to say that I agree most heartily with what the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has said with reference to the necessity of maintaining in all its vigor and usefulness the civil-service system of this country. I regard the civil-service system of the greatest importance to this Government, and I would not intentionally impair its usefulness because of its far-reaching importance to the American people. This Government belongs to the people, and anything that contributes to the efficiency of the Government is necessarily beneficial to the people. There is a disposition in these days by some to regard the Government as the property of the favored few who happen to occupy official stations. There is no doubt about the spirit of autocracy being rampant in the land. From that theory, however, I most emphatically dissent. There is nothing on the surface which betokens quite so much danger to the future permanency of the Republic as that.

If I thought the adoption of this amendment would impair or materially reduce the efficiency of the civil-service system, I should oppose it with all the fervor of my soul; but I take it that there are not going to be very many women who will ask for these positions, and I am also convinced that the few who may ask for them will not be given employment if they shall prove themselves incapable of performing the duties of the place to which they aspire. These are trying times, and the difficulties of the immediate future are going to be more trying still.

I think every advantage should be given the soldier's wife, sister, or mother in the matter of Government employment which will enable them to make the living and support the ones dependent upon the soldier who is fighting the country's battles in the trenches. Nothing is too good for the loved ones of the brave boys who are defending the flag in a foreign country, and if they are not here to receive the favors at the hands of the Government, for God's sake let it be given to their wives, mothers, or sisters, as the case may be, who are taking his place in the support of the family.

The effect of this law is temporary, and even if it should not work altogether satisfactorily it will result in very little harm, because the war, I trust, will soon be over and normal conditions will be resumed.

There is cogency in the arguments made by the able Senators from Nebraska and Colorado. I may be swayed somewhat by sentiments of love and sympathy, but it is a pardonable weakness, I trust, on my part. I think my constituents living and posterity will overlook any weakness that I may exhibit in leaning to those whose loved ones are "over there" fighting and dying that the American flag may remain triumphant in the air.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, when I offered this amendment an attack upon the United States civil-service law or its rules and regulations was not in my mind. It is not an attack upon that law in the guise of a law for the benefit of the wives of soldiers and sailors.

But, Mr. President, I know of nothing sacred about the United States Civil Service Commission or the law establishing it, or the rules and regulations which have been promulgated, which have prevented many meritorious women and men in this country from entering into this service, which they are entitled to enter. I know of no reason why the Civil Service Commission should be exempt from any modification or change in this crisis of the Government. Why is it more sacred than many institutions and many laws that we have modified, amended, or suspended during this emergency?

Nor will I agree, Mr. President, that the employment of the wives of soldiers and sailors in bringing them here to Washington will injuriously affect the employees of the governmental service. I take it that there will be good women and industrious women who will come here earnestly seeking to earn a livelihood for their children while their fathers or their husbands are in the foreign service. I do not think it will in any way affect the standing, the morals, the effectiveness, of the Government service in Washington. On the contrary, I believe the presence of these women here will have a tendency to elevate it. They are not coming here unless they need the employment. They are not going to leave their homes and their relatives unless they enter the service of the Government to earn a livelihood. If there are very few of them who are to come, then the effect will be in proportion to the number.

I see nothing in these arguments about the sacredness of the Civil Service Commission or about the women who will come here and enter into the service that should argue against the amendment. I offered the amendment in good faith for the benefit of good women, women who will want to supplement their scanty allowances with their own labor. It does not provide for any gratuity. It provides for payment for services rendered. The Government will get full value received for whatever is paid them. I think it is a meritorious measure, and it ought to be adopted. It will terminate with the war, as will this bill and every amendment to it. There is no permanent attack upon the civil-service law or any invasion whatever upon the present rules and regulations except during the present emergency.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am inclined to believe that the Senator who prepared this amendment might add a proviso in some way so as to give it greater effect than it would have in the present language. I do not know of any branch of the Government service where any woman is excluded from the service simply because she is a married woman. There is always some other element connected with the situation which prohibits her from entering the service. If there is any branch of the service where the mere fact of marriage provides a disqualification I do not know of it; but there are cases where marriage coupled with some other condition disqualifies. I assume the Senate will want to adjourn in a few minutes, and that it will do so without passing upon this amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have noticed the language of the subsection to which the amendment is offered, and there is probably some ambiguity about it, or it might not be as broad as desired. I presume the language could be modified in conference to carry out the evident intention of the Senate. However, I will be perfectly willing to withdraw the amendment I offered and substitute for it the following:

Provided, That the United States civil-service law, rules, and regulations shall not apply to the wives of soldiers and sailors while their husbands are in active service during the present war.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator from New Mexico permit me?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that he add "or to mothers or sisters upon whom the family is dependent." There are instances where the mother of the soldier has the care, or rather the support, of the family devolving upon her. I know of instances in this city where the sister is carrying the entire cost and expense of maintaining the family. If you are going to make it apply to the wife, I think you ought to make it apply to the mother and sister. I suggest to the Senator from New Mexico, if he will pardon me further, that the Senator from Tennessee take this matter under consideration and prepare his amendment to cover these points and present it in the morning.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to state that I am in sympathy with the purpose sought to be accomplished, but I feel that a little further reflection might be given to the language of the amendment, including the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, it is quite important that we have an executive session in order that some Army nominations may be confirmed. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 5 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday August 24, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 23, 1918.

The House met at 11 o'clock.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in heaven, we would draw near to Thee, that we may receive Thy spiritual touch and be inspired to meet the duties of the new day with intellectual, moral, and spiritual strength; that with religious zeal and patriotic fervor we may be faithful servants unto Thee and unto our country in this hour of need; in the Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TEMPORARY INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12731.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12731, and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this vote 291 Members, a quorum, answered to their names.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. RUSSELL was granted leave of absence for 30 days, on account of illness.

TEMPORARY INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The SPEAKER. The question is on going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the draft bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12731, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12731, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12731) amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. The general debate having been exhausted, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second sentence of section 2 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens and male persons residing in the United States, not alien enemies, who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 18 and 45, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act: Provided, That the President may draft such persons liable to military service in such sequence of ages and at such time or times as he may precribe: And provided further, That a citizen or subject of a country neutral in the present war who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States shall be relieved from liability to military service upon his making a declaration, in accordance with such regulations as the President may prescribe, withdrawing his intention to become a citizen of the United States, which shall operate and be held to cancel his declaration of intention to become an American citizen, and he shall forever be debarred from becoming a citizen of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, strike out the word "precribe" and insert "prescribe."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, after the word "prescribe," strike out the following: "And provided further, That a citizen or subject of a country neutral in the present war who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States shall be relieved from liability to military service upon his making a declaration, in accordance with such regulations as the President may prescribe, withdrawing his intention to become a citizen of the United States, which shall operate and be held to cancel his declaration of intention to become an American citizen, and he shall forever be debarred from becoming a citizen of the United States."

And insert:

"Provided, however, That registrants who on the date fixed by the President for registration are of the age of 19 years and not over 20 years shall be designated as the 19 class and shall be drafted subsequent to registrants in class 1 of the age of 20 years and over the age of 20 years; and registrants of the age of 18 years and not over 19 years shall be designated the 18 class and shall be last called for service. All registrants of the age of 20 years and above on the day fixed by the President for registration shall be called prior to those in the classes hereby created."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. STAFFORD. For a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire whether the second amendment submitted by the committee is really a substitute for the amendment just read striking out. The amendment submitted by the committee has no relevancy whatever to the subject matter of the amendment suggested by the committee striking out. They are two separate and distinct propositions, and the vote should be taken separately upon it.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I think we will have no difficulty about that. The gentleman is entirely correct. It is not intended as a substitute, but was intended as a separate amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE. The last amendment should be read first.

Mr. STAFFORD. The vote now comes on, I contend, the amendment of the committee striking out, independent of the vote on the McKenzie amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was inclined to treat this as one amendment—a motion to strike out and insert. However, if the chairman of the committee——

Mr. DENT. I ask unanimous consent that the two amendments be treated separately.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the two amendments be treated separately. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to see if I am clear about it. The vote now is to come on lines 7 to 16, which deals with the forfeiture of the first papers of aliens who do not become drafted?

The CHAIRMAN. The vote in the determination of the committee comes on the portion stricken out in the bill.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 160, noes 11.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That registrants who on the date fixed by the President for registration are of the age of 19 years and not over 20 years shall be designated as the 19 class and shall be drafted subsequent to registrants in Class I of the age of 20 years and over the age if 20 years; and registrants of the age of 18 years and not over 19 years shall be designated the 18 class and shall be last called for service. All registrants of the age of 20 years and above on the day fixed by the President for registration shall be called prior to those in the classes hereby created.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have a perfecting amendment to the text ahead of that——

Mr. LUNN. This is a perfecting amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Which affects the amendment now about to be considered, my amendment being in line 2, page 2, to strike out the word "eighteen" and insert "nineteen." May not I be heard on that?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington will have an opportunity. The gentleman from New York, as the Chair understands, is offering a perfecting amendment, and as a member of the committee will be first heard.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. One moment, if the Chair will indulge me. I should like an opportunity to show the House that if we can make the minimum age 19 we have no need to hold in the amendment of the gentleman from New York, beginning line 17.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there will be no trouble about this at all. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] will have an opportunity to submit to the House his proposition. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUNN: Page 2, line 24, after the word "and," insert the words "so far as practicable."

Second amendment offered by Mr. LUNN: Page 3, line 1, after the word "shall," insert the words "so far as practicable."

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent as a member of the committee, not having spoken yesterday, to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, in offering these two amendments to the McKenzie amendment, I am doing it so as to make the McKenzie amendment, if it should pass, as little in the way of obstructive legislation against the War Department as possible. I am opposed to the McKenzie amendment, but no one knows how an amendment may be acted upon by the House, and I am offering two perfecting amendments; and I trust that the two amendments which I offer will be passed by the House. I want to be perfectly fair with the House by saying that with my amendments agreed to, even then I shall vote against the McKenzie amendment. The War Department——

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield before he goes to the War Department?

Mr. LUNN. I will yield.

Mr. GORDON. The effect of your amendment will be, of course, to nullify the McKenzie amendment as a legal proposition?

Mr. LUNN. The gentleman should have waited for his question until I made my argument.

Mr. GORDON. You have already stated you are opposed to the amendment. I understand your purpose is to defeat it by the adoption of your amendment.

Mr. LUNN. You were not——

Mr. GORDON. In other words, chloroform it.

Mr. LUNN. If I could chloroform it, I would gladly do so.

Mr. GORDON. Of course, and that is your amendment.

Mr. LUNN. The purpose of my amendments, as stated before, is to make the McKenzie amendment, in case it should pass, as little obstructive as possible. Secretary Baker has stated, in as definite language as possible, that the purpose of the War Department was to defer calling the younger men into active service so far as practicable, calling the men above 31 years prior to the junior class.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. I would like to proceed, because I know my time will go. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama if he will ask for additional time——

Mr. DENT. I am perfectly willing the gentleman should have all the time he wants. I think he is entitled to it as a member of the committee. The gentleman made a statement that I would like to have some understanding about. He stated that the War Department had no intention of calling boys of 18 and 19 until the older men were called. Does not the gentleman distinctly remember that I put that question to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of War said that they expected to classify the men between 19 and 36 and call those first? [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. In answer let me quote from the Secretary of War in the hearings on page 4:

I can see no objection to putting into the bill a provision that will make of the 18 and 19 year old men a separate class, to be called after the others, so far as practicable, but I would not like to see it put in as a hard-and-fast rule.

No one can tell how rapidly the classification can be made. The classification between 31 and 45 will not be as rapid and can not be as rapid as the classification of the 18, 19, and 20 year old youths. The purpose of the War Department is to place these young men in training schools and keep them there as long as they possibly can. There is not a man on the floor of this House more interested in conserving the man power of this Nation than is the Secretary of War and the men associated with him. It is unfair for Members to assert that 18-year-old boys are to be used while slackers remain. No slackers will remain in this country so far as it is humanly possible to search them out and compel their service. It is also contrary to fact to speak of young men of 18, 19, and 20 years of age as if they were mere children. To refer to them as anemic youths, mere children, babies, and so forth, is grossly to misrepresent the real facts. If you were to have all the young men of 18, 19, and 20 years of age stand up in America, you would witness a magnificent sight of splendid youth ready and willing to give their service to their Nation in time of need. [Applause.]

They stand for the war and stand for it now. My own boy, 16 years old, weighs 154 pounds, and is making preparations to go as a soldier at 18. He can not enlist until he is 18. It would be a source of supreme sorrow to me if, at that age, he should hesitate for one moment in giving his life, if need be, for his country. He will not hesitate, but he can not enlist until he is 18 years old.

Mr. FIELDS. The gentleman does not want that statement to go into the RECORD. He can enlist now.

Mr. LUNN. I tried to have a boy of 17 enlisted, having his parents' consent, but he could not enlist.

Mr. GORDON. Your boy can enlist with your consent.

Mr. LANGLEY. All you have to do is to give your consent.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Give your consent; that is all that is necessary.

Mr. LUNN. If enlistment is in order for the 17-year-old boys, I will have a great deal taken off my shoulders, because I have many applications; but the War Department will not accept them. The gentlemen, however, are mistaken. The law permits of no enlistments in the Army under 18 years of age.

It has been reported that a Member of the House will place on exhibition an 18-year-old boy. If this is done, the 18-year-old boy should be an average boy of that age. It is unfair, however, to argue that those of us who believe that the War Department can safely be trusted as to the time of calling out the junior classes are arguing in favor of placing the junior class in advance positions prior to thorough training and prior to the utilization, to the utmost, of our older man power. The 18-year-old class should be called last, so far as practicable, and that is the purpose of the Secretary of War; and that is why I am opposed to the McKenzie amendment, which seeks to restrict the action of the War Department. It is the power of Congress to fix the various ages at which men can be drafted. It is within their power to fix the age limits 16 to 60, or 19 to 50, or 18 to 45, or any other age limits; but it seems to me it would be a colossal mistake, after fixing the age limits, to endeavor to regulate the method and the time of their call. I am against having a committee on the conduct of the war, even though composed of Congress in its entirety, to determine military matters, which in all reason should rest with the military authorities. I am willing to trust the Commander in Chief of the Army and his advisers to safeguard the highest interests of our youth.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. Not just now. On page 5 we have a committee amendment, which reads as follows:

That the Secretary of War is authorized to assign to educational institutions, for special and technical training, soldiers who enter the military service under the provisions of this act in such numbers and under such regulations as he may prescribe; and is authorized to contract with such educational institutions for the subsistence, quarters, and military and academic instruction of such soldiers.

Funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated for quarters and subsistence of the Army shall be available for payments to educational institutions under the contracts above authorized, including the cost of military and academic instruction.

I maintain that with the passage of the McKenzie amendment not a single youth of 18 or 19, or of those included in the prohibition of the McKenzie amendment, can be called, even for training; not even for training can they be called, nor can they be placed in educational institutions. To my mind many of the arguments advanced for the McKenzie amendment are arguments for a nation playing with war, and not for a nation that is face to face with the most colossal war in the history of the world. Young men of these ages, many of them, are on the firing line. That is not an argument, however, to place the youths immediately to the front, I would defer their call just so far as practicable, but I would not restrict the War Department in these terrible days. I personally believe that not one boy of 18 will be sent to the front for at least one year.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LUNN. My faith is predicated on the basis of the determination to bring as many men as possible into the service that are now exempted, men that are doing work that may not be quite as essential as we thought.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. One statement more, and then I will yield. But who is best able to decide when these boys shall be called and trained? Can we not trust the War Department in this matter? If we can not trust the War Department in this matter, and all other matters, we are in a serious situation. As for myself, I will trust them, believing that they will act in accordance with the best interests of the Nation and the highest interests of our young men. The amendment would not allow us even to call the junior classes for training. If necessity required, if the fortunes of war went against us so terribly that we had to put the utmost of our man power, 18-year-old boys, as well as others, in the front, they would have to go untrained, and the fearful responsibility would rest upon those who are endeavoring to restrict the War Department in the performance of its functions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his colleague may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire if there is going to be any limitation on time for the consideration of this and other amendments? Otherwise we would be here until midnight.

Mr. DENT. I would like to have an agreement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, in arranging the time I would like to state to the committee that on yesterday I was promised 10 minutes in general debate. The time was arranged for me on both lists but was not available. Now, then, I favor the Lunn amendment. I am opposed to the McKenzie amendment. At some stage in the proceedings I want to offer an amendment to make the minimum age 19 years, and I want to show that that is in accordance with the views of the department and will not delay the draft preparations that are actually proceeding this day. If I can have that time now and be allowed 15 minutes now in behalf of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York I shall be thankful to the committee.

Mr. DENT. I do not think the gentleman will have any trouble in getting time. He is entitled to it. I would like to have some agreement as to the length of time in which the McKenzie amendment and amendments thereto shall be discussed.

Mr. KAHN. What does the gentleman suggest as to the proper basis of time?

Mr. DENT. I would suggest an hour and a half.

Mr. KAHN. I think a little longer ought to be given to the House, because, after all, it is this amendment that will occasion the greatest amount of debate.

Mr. DENT. How much time will the gentleman suggest?

Mr. KAHN. I will suggest two hours and a half.

Mr. DYER. Make it three hours.

Mr. KAHN. There is a feeling over here that it should be made three hours. I shall be perfectly agreeable to that.

Mr. CANNON. This is the amendment that will produce considerable discussion, even under the five-minute rule without extensions. Why not proceed for the present?

Mr. STAFFORD. If we do not have some limitation Members will ask for extensions, and we shall be here until midnight.

Mr. LITTLE. What of it?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] desire to submit any request?

Mr. DENT. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the McKenzie amendment and all amendments thereto be concluded in three hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the debate on the McKenzie amendment and all amendments thereto close in three hours. Is there objection?

Mr. MEEKER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, who is to control that time?

Mr. DENT. I ask that one-half of the time be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and one-half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama supplements his request by adding that one-half of the time shall be controlled by the gentleman from California and one-half by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri reserves the right to object.

Mr. RUCKER. I would like to have the attention of the chairman. I think it is plain that practically all the debate on this bill centers around this amendment and amendments thereto. Three hours' debate will be consumed by a few gentlemen, with the extensions they have asked for and ought to have. This is an important matter, and many of us would like to have a few moments in which to express our views. I think the debate ought to go on without limitation now, and in two or three or four hours from now the gentleman from Alabama can protect himself so as to complete his bill to-day.

Mr. LUNN. That is right.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my request.

Mr. RUCKER. I hope the request will be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is withdrawn.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Does the gentleman from Alabama withdraw his proposal?

The CHAIRMAN. He has withdrawn it. The gentleman from Florida is submitting a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. When will it be in order to offer other amendments to this section—after the McKenzie amendment has been discussed and voted on, or now, when it is pending?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the committee amendment will have preference in voting. Other amendments may be submitted and be pending, but the vote will come first on that.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then I ask leave to offer two amendments to the section now, in order that they may be pending and voted on.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we ought to take them in their order, and I shall object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done only by unanimous consent. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] has requested that the time of his colleague [Mr. LUNN] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman what practical difficulty is there in the way of calling the older men before the younger men are called?

Mr. LUNN. The gentleman asks what are the practical difficulties that forbid the calling of the older men prior to the calling of the 18 and 19 year class. I can not better answer that than by reading the statement of Secretary Baker before our committee, as follows:

> I can see no objection to putting into the bill a provision that will make of the 18 to 19 year men a separate class, to be called after the others, so far as practicable, but I would not like to see it put in as a hard and fast rule, for this reason: That the process of classifying the men from 31 to 45 is a long drawn-out process; the questions of fact involved in their industrial relations require very careful working out, and some of the cases, which many of you members of the committee may have seen, are rather voluminous records, so that the classification of the men from 31 to 45 will be a long drawn-out process—> and the time might come when we would not have exhausted the men from 45 down, and yet so many of them would be in the process of being classified and questions of appeal and questions of determination still open about them that there would be a shortage if we did not go into the junior class. So that my judgment is that it is perfectly proper to put in the bill a provision which will make a separate class of the men from 18 to 19, to be called, so far as practicable, after the exhaustion of the remaining number in class 1.

Now, to answer the question of the gentleman from Texas further, if in the process of these classifications they had so many hundreds of thousands of men of the older age in class 1 ready to be called, they could immediately call those men. If they were of a sufficient number to fill the quotas, they would not have to go into the junior classes. Neither do the War Department officials intend to invade the junior classes so long as they have the older men on whom they can draw, and I believe that they will so arrange their program that the younger men will not be called until they absolutely must be called, and then they will have had splendid training and will be used on the other side in the same way; that is, the lesser trained will not be called to the fighting front until they are fully trained.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the McKenzie amendment meet your proposition by providing that those in class 1 of the higher age shall be called before those of the lower age?

Mr. LUNN. The McKenzie amendment makes no such distinction. The reason I use this perfecting language is that that may be so—so that, so far as practicable, it may be done. Let us not tie the hands of the men who are responsible for conducting the war—so that, no matter what contingency might arise, they would be powerless to act—when they have expressed themselves as willing to defer these classes as long as practicable and take the older men first.

Mr. MEEKER. In the hearings did anything come out as to why they are not calling out the men in class 2?

Mr. HARDY. Let me finish my question. This reads that they shall be drafted subsequent to the registrants in class 1 of the age of 20 years and over.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman will read a little further, he will find that the amendment with reference to those in the 18 class does not defer them simply to those in class 1, and that they are not, under this language, to be called until everybody who registers from 18 to 45 has been exhausted.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will say to my friend from Minnesota that there is no such intention.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not know anything about the intention, but the language is exceedingly plain.

Mr. LUNN. I have only one minute, and I want to use that one minute by saying that no one would deplore more than I the utilization of the boys of 18 unless it becomes absolutely necessary; but I do deplore the attempt on the floor of the House to infer that the young men of America of 18, 19, and 20 are not willing and able to go at any time that the Nation may need them; and our purpose is that they shall go only when the Nation does need them. This is the purpose of the Secretary of War and his advisers, and I believe American opinion is back of that proposition. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I did not discuss this bill in general debate, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for at least 15 minutes. I do not know whether I can get through or not in that time, but I would like that much time.

Mr. HARDY. Make it 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. Gentlemen of the committee, setting aside at the opening of my remarks all such criticisms as those made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], who spoke on yesterday, that would in any way impugn the patriotism and loyalty of a man who would offer such an amendment as I have offered to this bill and which is now pending, I shall endeavor to discuss this proposition from a calm, unprejudiced, and, I believe, patriotic standpoint.

You are well aware that when we passed the national-defense act a few years ago, a bill which I had some little part in framing, we provided that the Congress of the United States might authorize the drafting into the Military Establishment of the country our man power from the age of 18 to 45. That is the law of the land to-day. I do not question the wisdom of it; I believe in it. Later, war came. I, with many of you here, felt that the time had come when it would be pusillanimous for this country longer to refrain from entering into the arena of the great conflict. After war was declared the War Department officials came before us and asked that the Military Committees of the House and the Senate report a bill providing for the enlargement of the Regular Army and the National Guard to war strength, and the drafting of 1,000,000 men to go into what was known as the National Army and also the drafting of men for technical units. At that time they asked us to fix the age limit from 19 to 25. The Military Committee of the House brought in a report fixing the age limit from 21 to 40, ignoring the recommendation of the Secretary of War and of the other officers in the United States Army. I was one, as you remember, of a minority of eight on that committee who stood on the floor of this House and fought for immediate conscription of the men of this country between the ages of 21 and 40.

Under the leadership of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], who was then a militant fighter, a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, it went to the Senate in that form, and the Senate inserted practically the recommendation of the War Department in lieu of the House limitations as to age, and from there it went to conference, and under the leadership of Mr. KAHN, with the other conferees of the House, we stood for the 21 years limitation. Ah, but that was before my distinguished friend from California had abrogated and surrendered every right as one of the American people—act upon his own good judgment. Then the law was placed on the statute books of this country providing that we might draft the man power from 21 to 31 years of age, inclusive. That is the law now.

We are now asked to change the draft law. Why? Because there is not a sufficient number of men in class 1 under the new classification program to make up an army proposed now by the War Department of 5,000,000 men.

I want to say in passing that I am for the 5,000,000 army. I never did believe that it was good policy to try to bore a 2-inch auger hole with a gimlet. I am for the big army. Why the shortage of men? We registered between ten and eleven million men between the ages of 21 and 31 in this country. They were classified under regulations prescribed by the President of the United States. Under the liberal regulations tens of hundreds of thousands of men physically fit for military duty are to-day safely hiding behind the barricades put up by these regulations. So when Gen. Crowder was called upon to furnish men for the new army of 80 divisions in France and 18 divisions in this country, he said, "I have not got the men; I have got less than half a million men remaining in class 1 in this country." Where are they? You know and I know where they are; but rather than change the regulations that would shake out the employees of thousands of nonessential industries in this country; rather than to shake out of the Government departments in Washington thousands of able-bodied men that are doing woman's work; rather than take the hundreds of fellows from the ball fields of the country; rather than call the married man who rides in his automobile with his wife without a child, living on the income of invested inheritance; rather than do that and putting him into the service, they say that we want 5,000,000 men, and we must raise the draft age to 45 and lower it to 18.

Am I opposed to the raising of these men? You know that I am not. The gentleman from California, when he speaks about the power of this Nation to put it all into defeat of Germany, I am with him. I do not complain of that; I am in favor of taking men from the cradle to the grave, if necessary, to destroy the militarism that endangers us. [Applause.]

Ah, but he says we ought not to make the mistake that England and France have made in not calling 18-year-old boys at first. Oh, the glorious record of France! May her flag ever wave. When we think that that tricolor was held supreme at Verdun against the onslaughts of the mighty men of Germany; when we realize that the great majestic military power that swept through little Belgium, entering at the unprotected back door, was defeated at the Marne not by the boys of France but by the men, and hurled back, and have been held until this hour, and yet the boys of 18 of France, while in training, are not yet in the trenches.

Although in my veins flows the blood of a man who came from the hills of Scotland, I have had my prejudice against that little land of England, but when I realize that in obedience to a sacred treaty that they had pledged themselves to uphold in defense of the little nation of Belgium they hurled themselves unprepared in front of the mightiest military force this world has ever seen, I take my hat off to England. [Applause.] Such courage and fidelity are distinguishing characteristics of a strong and great people. Yes; she threw her army in there and it was destroyed. She then went back and she called her men, not her boys, and she has been calling them year after year for four years, and not until last March, when the commander of the English Army gave out the word that England was fighting with her back to the wall, did they put in their boys of 18 and 20. Do you mean to stand here and tell men, you patriots from New York, you men who boast of patriotism—does the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] dare impugn my motives and say that if the Germans were at our gates, if the Capital of our Nation were being bombarded by German cannon, if our cities were being destroyed, that I would not say to put in the boys of 18 if short of men? Ah, they know that I would. I am for that thing. I am for a powerful military program from first to last, and no quibbling about it. War is terrible, and I am in favor of making it terrible, but I am not in favor of taking the least powerful, the least efficient of our men, and throwing them into the ranks. I want the best Army that we can get to go to France. I offer this amendment not because of any particular interest in the individual boy, while I love him, but I offer this amendment because I believe it is good military policy, and I believe it will give us the strongest Army that we can get, stronger than if we put in the boys. What does it do? It simply says yes; that we agree, though it may be a trial for us to do so, that you may list the boys from 18 to 21 along with the men to 45, put them all in; we are not denying them the power nor the right. We put them in; and what does my amendment say? It simply says to the War Department—and from the bottom of my heart I believe it is good military policy—you can take the boys from 20 up, you can take the men up to 45 as you please, you can put them in to fill the quotas as they come along, but the boys of 19 shall not be called until these men are taken, and they will make stronger and better soldiers for our country, and then the boys of 18 shall be called last. Who is to compose the 18 divisions that remain in this land? Shall they be made up of men of 40 and over, or shall we reserve for that force the young boys of the country? You men who have advocated universal military training, I appeal to your sense of judgment to-day.

Is it not simple wisdom, is it not good policy, to hold those 18-year-old boys back and call them when the necessity requires it and put them in the camps of this country and train them? Ah, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] says let us put in the words "as far as practicable," so that you can invade the homes at any time and leave at home the men who ought to go and put in the boys. Oh, have we come to the place in this great land of ours, boasting of its strength, its power—and we have been proud of it—have we at the end of one year found that we are a nation of slackers? Have we found that all of our protestations of love for the flag and the love of liberty sink into insignificance when compared to the desire and privilege of making gold, and that rather than disturb the business interests of the country, the industrial interests of the country, by taking men to fight our war, we shall take the boys of 18? God pity the great American Republic, with all of its boasted power and strength, if that is to be the rule! [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will these boys of 18 and 19 and 20 fight? Oh, you know they will. No man has read the story of the Civil War, of how those young boys covered the ground at Shiloh with their bodies, and at Donelson, and at Vicksburg, and in Virginia, men of the North and the South. Men? No; boys! Yes; boys wrote those glorious pages of American history. It was done by a nation of heroes, but those heroes were boys. What shall be written over the names of men, the men who stayed at home and let the boys do it? If in this hour, when we are boasting of our power and our fight for democracy in the world, if a man is to be branded as not being entirely loyal when he pleads for these youths, then what shall be written over the names of the men who stay at home? What is the proper word to write over the name of the slacker, who is standing back, the man who could go just as well as not, the man who would make a man soldier, to meet the men soldiers of Germany? But, no; he must take care of his business and we must send the boy! My friends, I am not fighting the War Department, I am not fighting the President of the United States. I am standing by them, and have been all through this conflict, and will continue to do so in everything that I believe to be right; but when you put me upon the Committee on Military Affairs I went on there as a free man, thank God, with free men. I stand here to-day as a free American citizen, appealing to other free American citizens to do the thing that they believe will be best for the country and not best for some individual. When I went on that committee I resolved to give my best and most earnest thought to these great questions that come before it and I am still doing so, but I decline most respectfully to surrender my manhood and what little intelligence I have, what patriotism I may have. I decline to surrender this to the Kaiser of Germany or to any other man who would undertake to dictate to me and say that I must lie down and have nothing to say in that position. When it comes to that, I want to be relieved of the responsibility of serving upon the Committee on Military Affairs.

My friends, it is up to you. You can put these boys in now, I am not saying they shall not be registered, that they may be used if necessary; all I am appealing for is that, in the name of justice, in the name of good military policy, you take the older men first to stand the terrible strain that will be put upon them, that you use them first, and if the time comes when we need them then we will put in the boys. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], a member of the committee, is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask, as a member of the committee, as I did not speak yesterday, that I may be given 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, Germany has done her worst. Let us do our best and send the pride of our country to do it.

It is necessary that America send overseas a force large enough to enable the allies to hold the line from Switzerland to the sea. Germany has 13 lines of fortifications already prepared between the point where she is now fighting and the Rhine. Gen. March says that with the millions he asks he can cross the German line at will. He did not mention the sacrifice, but those of us who look at the war practically, with the fixed determination to win the war, are willing to make any sacrifice for the victory that we must win.

The present fight over the McKenzie amendment is a tempest in the teapot. There is already provision of law authorizing the draft of men for the National Guard between the ages of 18 and 45. The Hay bill of June, 1916, commonly known as the national-defense act, so provides.

The idea of the War Department now is to amend the last draft act so that men between the ages of 18 and 45 can be called for the other forces, because the number of men between 21 and 31 is not adequate to produce in class 1 enough men to meet the requirements of the military situation in France.

The plan of the department is to group by regulation, after the registration of all men who would come in under the new ages, those who would fall in class 1 from 32 to 36 years old, inclusive, together with those who would be in class 1 of 19 and 20 years old, inclusive. There would be a lottery as heretofore adopted and they would be called indiscriminately, as it would be a very great mistake to put all the old men in one draft and all the young in another.

The McKenzie amendment grew out of a misunderstanding of the Secretary of War's statement before the committee and was largely actuated by the desire of certain men to make a hard-and-fast rule which could not be changed even if exigencies required it. The Secretary repeated several times that it was not the intention of the War Department to take the men above 37 years of age or those below 19 until necessity required it, but that it would be perilous to write into the law a rule that would not be flexible and which would interfere with the mobilization of the full man power of our country.

Gen. March, Chief of Staff, stated and repeated under cross-examination by me that if this bill was passed as he asked it that he was satisfied that the war would end by Christmas, 1919. This is a result devoutly wished, and I can not understand how anyone who did not doubt his sincerity could refuse his request. It is the intention of the War Department, as expressed by the Secretary and his aids, to mobilize all of the men in class 1 between the ages of 18 and 45 prior to June 30, 1919. And, as a matter of fact, it is expected that most, if not all, of them will be in uniform by January or February of next year.

The science of warfare will require a substantial reserve force at all times at home, and the necessities of the country will require the continuation of the education of our young men in order that the necessary officer personnel may not be depleted, that the adequate technical units may be kept at full strength, and that society will not suffer after the war for lack of education. For that reason provision is made in the amendment offered by Mr. LUNN and suggested by the War Department for the education in the institutions already inspected, numbering more than 400 at this time, and many others hereafter to be selected, of all young men who show aptitude, and then in the particular line for which they are fitted. It is expected that the old men and the 18-year-old boys will make up the reserve army, and that under these regulations, if the bill is passed as the Chief of Staff asks it, that we will be able to put three or four million men in France in time to be used early next year.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do.

Mr. DYER. What does the gentleman call old men?

Mr. CALDWELL. Above 36.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman call those old men?

Mr. CALDWELL. Relatively old men in the draft.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman means older men.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; older men.

All of the wars of America have been fought by the young men and boys, though the old men have done their share. We are only carrying out the policy of religious history as established by the ancient Jews, and which policy has been followed by every country of modern times. Criticism has been made that we are placing the burden of war on the shoulders of the boys of the country. The answer to this lies in the fact that to fight for one's country is not a burden but an honor. Following the Civil War and for 25 years thereafter practically every important place in the Government of this country was held by a man with an honorable war record. When the boys come home they will take control of the country they have saved. To give the young men the opportunity to participate in the great enterprise is a favor and not a hardship.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will.

Mr. AYRES. Is there anything in the McKenzie amendment that precludes the War Department from calling the 18 and 19 year old boys to the cantonments to be prepared?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. AYRES. I understand there is not.

Mr. CALDWELL. I understand there is, because it says they shall not be drafted, although they shall be registered, until all the other men have been drafted.

Mr. AYRES. The author of the McKenzie amendment says it does not preclude the War Department from calling them.

Mr. CALDWELL. It is a difference of opinion and construction, and I refer to the amendment itself.

It is usually the father that seeks exemption for the young man, but he always blames the mother and boasts that the boy wants to fight. Why this objection? I have not heard the boys complain. I would not send the young men under age to war unless it was necessary. Neither would I send one over age, for that matter. But the necessity has occurred, and to my mind it is quite apparent. When I voted for war I pledged my country and its citizens to its support, and I see no reason now to violate the pledge.

I have heard that this is a war of science and machinery; but in the last analysis it will be won by our athletes with guns in their hands. The enemy has thrown her young manhood into the struggle. Let us meet her with a superior force; or, as I said in the beginning, Germany has done her worst. Let us do our best and send the pride of our country to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I ask how much time the gentleman has already consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALDWELL. What excuse would we have to offer if we refused to give the President the power to recruit the Regular Army and the National Army that we have already given him to fill up the ranks of the National Guard now in service? In the Hay bill the President has that power.

I believe that I have seen the magnitude of this war from the very beginning. I can see very clearly now, as I have since war was declared, the necessity for sending a force large enough to hold the line from Switzerland to the sea, a distance of more than 400 miles, with 13 men to the yard all the way. Germany is retreating now. She has retreated under pressure, but for a triple reason: First, on account of the pressure of the allied armies; second, because she seeks to shorten her line and use her forces thus relieved on the eastern front; and, third, that she might intrench herself behind the wall on which the spears of Canada and Australia blunted and bent as if they were made of wax. The Irish, the Scotch, the Canadian, and the Australian are our nearest kin. Our soldiers are more nearly like those than any others. Let us not make a mistake of sending too small a force upon this Herculean task. Remember Germany has 13 lines of fortification already prepared between the point where she is now fighting and the Rhine. Gen. March says that with these millions he can cross the German line at will. He did not mention the sacrifice, but those of us who look at the war practically, with the fixed determination to win the war, are willing to make any sacrifice, especially if it will enable us to go through the German line. Let us furnish an adequate force to do it.

There is a compensation for this sacrifice if the job can be done in one year more, and that is the saving in human life which would be lost through the prolongation of the war. And, as between the two, the present sacrifice is preferable. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] for five minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to speak for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman requests leave to speak for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I do not see that the man who can "holler" the loudest has any particular advantage in this debate if the House will submit to the rule of reason. This is a plain matter of sound common sense, reinforced by such experience as we can get at. In that light one thought crept in here yesterday which should determine the decision of every man here who will stop to think. It now appears, as we were informed yesterday, that the Government of France has not yet reached the point where it draws upon its 18-year-old class. No nation in the world ever resisted so successfully such tremendous military assaults as France has met for four years. Those men have experience that qualifies them better than anybody in the world to determine when a nation should begin to draw upon its last resources, and they have decided, and their judgment ought to govern the action, thought, and vote of every fair man here.

The reason is obvious if you will stop and ponder for a moment. A nation in going to war must remember that there is another generation to follow. If you forget that, the next generation will essentially deteriorate. The statistics of Europe tell us that after every great war the nations most involved are an inch or two less in stature. Now, why is that? The great wars have, to a great extent, been fought until now by boys of from 16 to 21. They passed through the trials, perils, menaces, and privations that come with a great war before they were half developed, and they falter under the strain. No man would think of working a two-year old colt as a five-year old horse, and yet the wars of the world have been fought by boys, by the colts of the world. Seasoned timber endures. Nature intends its products shall attain a thorough development before use.

Gen. SHERWOOD volunteered at 26. Here he is at 82 hale and hearty, while he tells me his comrades of 18 and 20 are older now really than he. He is, of course, the most illustrious and most experienced soldier now in the service of the Republic, and he feels the lack of wisdom in sending schoolboys to war. No man is better authority, and he thinks as the French think. Who is there in the department that even compares with him as a soldier?

Thoughtless men have long sent boys to war undeveloped, half grown. They return apparently all right, but with constitutions undermined to face life again, and we see the long roll beaten for the list of pensioners who would not need pensions but for the undermined constitutions of undeveloped boys sent to war. Yet for centuries nations keep the men at home and see their battles fought by schoolboys.

What becomes of a nation then? The minute that happens their powers of reproduction begin to dwindle. A gentleman said here yesterday that the wars of Rome were fought by men of 17 to 40, and the wars of Greece by men of 16 to 60. But Greece and Rome floundered and broke and fell under that terrific strain. For generation after generation they sent their boys out to battle, but the nations fell back until anybody could lick them, the one-time conquerors of the world. That is why the men of France are not summoning their children to battle. That is the reason they are setting the example that we should follow.

Why, who are these men that want the boys to go to war while they stay at home? What reason is there that among the 20,000,000 names the War Department can find but 2,000,000 fighting men? In the first roll there were 10,000,000 listed for draft and only 1,500,000 have been drawn into the Army. I see that in this report [holding up the committee's report on the bill] the War Department tells us 10,000,000 of men are ready from 32 to 45, and that they can only use 600,000 of them. What is the matter with the rest of them? If they want soldiers, why do they not go and get them where France got hers, among the grown men of the Republic? Twenty million of men are waiting the call to arms, and only 2,100,000 of them have been marshalled in battle array—1 man in every 10. Then they turn to the boys. What do they say in this report? There are 3,100,000 schoolboys from 18 to 21. How many are they going to pick out of them? One million eight hundred thousand—3 in every 5. What for? To take places that should be filled by 18,000,000 men from 21 to 45. Of all the 20,000,000 that I have called your attention to but 800,000 are engaged in essential industries. Who are the other men? Are the men of this Republic cowards and slackers? God forbid! Enforce your rules and they will respond. This is a man's fight.

Man is the only animal that sends his offspring off to fight while he stays at home. [Applause.] There are enough slackers here in Washington to make a brigade. [Applause.] There are enough in any industry to make a division. They say that these are to be exempted because they are married men. Plenty of them would rather go than send their 18-year-olds. Of the 7,700,000 men who are married and above 31 years of age, 408,000 have been widowed or divorced. Why do they not go to war? They would be two-thirds of all they claim they can find above 31. The place to get your soldiers is where France and England got theirs, among the men.

Is anybody going to tell us that the men of America are cowards? I know that many gallant men and many kindly gentlemen favor this proposition. If it were not for that fact I should affirm without fear of contradiction that no brave man and no gentleman would think of sending his boy to war before he went himself. [Applause.] I know a man, a big-business man in my town, Frank Jennings, who said to me the other day—and he is a valuable citizen and has no boys to send—"I am 42 years of age. I would rather go myself than see any boy of 18 go to war." [Applause.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] said he wanted the boys of 18 to stand up and be registered as patriots. They have been registered as patriots in every battle from Bunker Hill to Gettysburg. Go and register yourselves, you men of 45! [Applause.]

It is not my purpose to cast animadversions upon the men who disagree with me. Men have come here and intimated challenges of the patriotism of those who disagree with them. Men who are afraid to go to war piece out their alleged patriotism abusing those who have fought because of some disagreement over policies. One man said to us yesterday that the welfare of the country is more important than the welfare of any family. Great God, my people knew that a hundred years before he had touched the shores of America. We do not need any orators from Europe to tell the sons of the men who fought at Bunker Hill, Saratoga, Brandywine, Lundy's Lane, the Cowpens, Bennington, New Orleans, Buena Vista, Vicksburg, and Shiloh that the welfare of the Republic is more important than the welfare of any given family. We know that. We do not have to be told by anybody from Europe that we need a big army; that 4,000,000 men will make a great assault. They say the committee was electrified when a staff officer—staff, I said—told them 4,000,000 would whip the Germans. We knew that last year. We knew that when we wanted to send a million of volunteers to Europe before they could get the draft law passed and into motion. If we had succeeded, we would have had 1,000,000 volunteers in France before last Christmas, Italy would be in Trieste, and Russia on the firing line. Plenty of us knew that then. Last fall I said to this House—September 13—that we would never accomplish anything until we have 3,000,000 men on the firing line. I am glad to see that the War Department has caught up with me. I welcome them to the field on which I have stood. We have been needing soldiers for months, and there are 8,500,000 men from 21 to 31 uncalled.

I have said these boys will deteriorate. Intelligence is the backbone of a republic. Every time you take a boy out of school you cut down the intelligence of the future. He should be in school and his father should be fighting. Is there any man of 45 that wants to stay at home while his boy goes to war? God have pity on him if he does! Yet there are 7,000,000 married men, some of them having children, who were listed immediately in the deferred classes. Come out of the brush, brave men! Come out of the brush, cowards and slackers! Go yourselves and register to be shipped to Europe, and let your boy stay in school, where he belongs, and with his mother. He is to furnish the intelligent voter of the future. Let him stay in order to build up the next generation. Utilize French experience. Do not rely on the eloquent gesticulations of men who admit they know nothing about the subject and depend entirely on somebody's ipse dixit.

Nor is that all. Every great industry that makes big money comes here to tell us how much it needs these men exempted. Who is going to farm this country? You have taken pretty much all the unskilled labor now except those who manage to escape all service. The farmers all over the great West have to depend now solely on the boys of 18 to 21. You could not strike the industries of this country a greater blow than to take them off the farm where they can do the work and where nobody else does it.

The farmers rely now on the minors to do the farm work. If a boy of 18 or 20 is as good as a man of 30 or 40, how does it happen the boys are not holding the places of responsibility or are not at least doing the work in the great factories? Every man here knows a regiment of men of 40 would defeat one of 20-year-olds. Every man knows a man of 35 makes a better soldier than a boy of 18, can endure more, takes better care of himself. I volunteered at 38, and I am helping those who were 20 then get pensions every month. Of course a developed man is better for any use than an undeveloped boy. It is a false economy that cuts the sapling and lets the big oak stand. A bby of 20 has 30 years of service before he is 50, while a man of 40 has only 10 years.

If we lose in battle a schoolboy we lose 30 useful years. If we lose a man of 40 we lose 10 such years. Yet these lads are adapted to farm work, and we have no others for it. This is as essential an industry as any the Republic has, and I warn you that the minute you take the last unskilled labor from the farm, the boy under 20, you have struck a blow at the business of this country more tremendous than you could deal by any that you could direct against any other industry, my friends.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. Gentlemen of the House, this is an important moment for us and for this great Republic. You are not now determining for the success of this war alone. If that is all you want, go among the 20,000,000 men and bring them out and let them fight. A man says in effect on this floor, I know nothing about this subject. I shall blindly follow the orders of somebody in the department in framing these laws. That is not an argument. That is a confession. You have taken an oath to serve the Republic with all the intelligence you have. If you have none, why are you here? Who are these experts? What fights were they in? What troops did they raise and lead to victory? Give us their credentials! You are now deciding what the future of your great Republic will be. Do you want the seeds of deterioration to be sown among us as they were sown in Greece and Rome? Do you want our Republic to start on the path that brought about the downfall of every great empire? Or do you want us, as brave men, like gallant men, to have the men of the Republic go out and fight for the Republic and save the fathers of the next generation until such time as it shall really become essential?

Why, little England and little France deferred—one of them does still—the drawing upon these little fellows—these young men, if you wish to call them so. Shall we, the great giant Republic, like a foolish boy scared by a shadow, who has not yet reached the crossing of the ford, be the first to call upon our children and wreck our schools?

At Guinginto one evening 19 years ago was fought the bloodiest fight in the Philippines. Across a rice field into a Tropic wood under a terrific fire they charged. After the battle, as I sat on a rice dike, a little boy of 18 came to me as if to his father, and he said, "Colonel, the boys were mighty brave today." They had been, and I had thought of it myself as they swept across a field on the charge I ordered. That little fellow wanted to talk it over with an older man just as at home. The man of 35 or 40 has to take the lead, the responsibility, with boys of 18 or 20. Of course a man of 25 to 40 is the burden bearer instead of the boy of 18 in war as elsewhere. I looked at him, and I thought of his mother at home and of his school where he ought to have been, and I said to him, "Sonny, the rest of them were not any braver than you, were they?" He had not thought of it. He was just a child, a schoolboy of 18, although he bore bravely the burden of a man of 25. A regiment of men of 40 years can whip a regiment of boys of 20. The boys lack the stability that comes with experience and development. They get sick quicker than mature men. They commit more indiscretions. They break down more easily. The Adjutant General indicated that the age of 26 is the ideal age for a soldier. When you get these boys you are not getting the stability, the force of character, the endurance, the preparation for difficulties, the understanding of what they are doing, of men of 40. Every man of 40 is better than his son of 20, and he is in authority, and he ought to go first. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] is recognized.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, practically ever since this has been a Nation of free men and free women we have permitted by law service in the Army and the Navy of boys of 18 years of age, and we have not yet found any great trouble or complaint by Members of Congress for permitting the boys of that age to enter the military and naval service of their country as volunteers.

But now, when we come with a proposition to place all boys of 18 years and up upon the same footing and make them all liable for military service, we find complaint.

Gentlemen, this bill is the right way and it is the proper thing to do, because it prevents lots of boys who are 18 years of age and unfit for military service from entering the service as by law to-day. Boys of 18 have been going until the last few days and enlisting in the service of the Army and of the Navy, and they have gone to France. There are thousands of them there, and they have given a good account of themselves. We now are putting into the selective-service law young men of the ages of 18 up to 21, and that will give the War Department authority to prevent the service of men of 18 years of age and 19 who are not qualified physically or where there are other reasons why they should not enter the Army, but it will give to a great many who are able the opportunity to enter.

I have, as a good many of you gentlemen have, some reluctance in voting to take into the service boys of 18, many of whom have been going to school. But, Mr. Chairman, some of the boys of 18 are not going to school. They are compelled to work for their daily bread upon the farm or in the factory, and while I would like to see the boys of my city who are 18 and who are going to the high schools permitted to complete their education, yet I am not willing to see preference given to the boys who have those advantages over those who do not have those advantages. I would not be in favor of voting for a proposition to permit them to go on to school because they are in school and not allow exemption to those who are not going to school.

Mr. Chairman, it is not a pleasant duty for any of us to vote for war. It is not a pleasant duty to vote into the Army the young boys of our land. But we are in a position to-day where our duty compels us to take a firm stand that must be taken in behalf of our country, and not for any other consideration. Human life is precious, but it is secondary to the welfare of our country, and we must stand to-day as men who are free against any personal interest, any personal welfare, and back up the Government of the United States in giving it that Army which it needs to fight this war. We must have the men, and the President comes to us, the Secretary of War comes to us, Gen. March, the Chief of Staff, comes to us, and tells us what they need. Shall we say that we, here in the House of Representatives, from the farms, from the law offices, from wherever we may come, are better able to decide these great and important questions, when the welfare of our country hangs, as it does, by the decision of battles? Shall we take unto ourselves the responsibilities and the assumption of intelligence of deciding these purely military questions, or shall we leave to the officials of our Government, the executive officers, the responsibility which under the Constitution of the United States is theirs? The President is the Commander in Chief, and we must give him power, and we must trust him to do that which is best and for the welfare of the whole people.

We have in office to-day a man, Maj. Gen. Crowder, the Provost Marshal General, against whom there has been no criticism with reference to this selective-service law. He has endeavored to have this draft law conducted fairly and properly; and, Mr. Chairman, I submit that we should leave these matters where they belong—with the military authorities. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, much has been said on this measure, and very much better said than anything that I could say. Yet I have felt that this bill should not pass without an expression of opinion on the measure.

The most sorrowful act in my life was the voting for the declaration of war. Yet it was a high duty, a grim necessity; and while we may regret the fact that the nations of the world are at war, and that our hundred millions of people are involved in that great controversy, still the high duty rests upon us as a legislative body to stand behind the Executive of the United States, charged with the successful prosecution of this war, until peace is made by the unconditional surrender of Germany. [Applause.]

Yet while all this is true, and while I, in common with you, have voted for every single measure looking to the successful prosecution of the war—opposed, indeed, in the first place to the draft law because I thought a volunteer army could be raised better and make a more effective army than a draft army, yet when the judgment of this committee was that the Army must be raised by the draft, all of us on the final vote on the conference report adopting the draft law supported that measure—we come now to the question of the extension of the draft law. The question presenting itself is, What course is wisest in the raising of an army for the further prosecution of this war? The system is settled. The only question before us is the age of the soldier who shall be called to bear arms in the defense of his country. It is said that the administration favors a bill that would place in the field soldiers from 18 years of age to 45 years of age. I do not know how this is, whether the President approves it or not. I assume that if the military branch of the Government are strongly for it, the President will not object to the passage of such a measure. Yet the responsibility rests, not upon the Executive but upon this body, in determining the character of the soldiery of our Government, and we must look not only to the successful prosecution of this war, but to the aftermath of war, the effect that this draft may have upon the citizenship of this Republic in the days to come. To my mind the suggestion that children shall be forced into the ranks of war, while mature and able-bodied men, of whom we can arm 10,000,000, enjoy the luxuries of peace 3,000 miles from the scene of conflict, carries with it a tinge of intense cowardice. [Applause.]

Who is this 18-year-old boy that you will consign to war while mature men have peace? He is only a child yet, clinging to the knees of that mother who taught him his prayers; a tender bud blooming into manhood.

Will you give him his opportunity in the battle of life by enabling him to have an education and to develop the character that at that age alone can be perfected, or will you give him to the battle of bullets and the grave while cowardly men stand back and receive the benefits of his death? [Applause.] That is the question before you. Who says he is not a good soldier? The bravest of the brave, he has been in every war that has ever been fought, and the world never saw braver or better soldiers than the tender boys from 18 to 20; without discretion perhaps, but true in the obedience of orders and the discharge of duty. Shall he be sacrificed? I see, Mr. Chairman, that you are about to drop the gavel. I ask for 10 minutes more time. I hope not to use it all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. I was about to remark, Mr. Chairman, that it is not fair to these boys, it is not fair to the Republic, which must have the benefit of a great citizenship later, that they be drafted into war now. If necessary, let them be placed in a deferred class and as a last resort take them into the Army to fight the battles of your country. If necessary in the meantime let them have some training, but defer, as the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] does, the classification of these boys. Discuss as you will the measure, and yet the simple question arises after all, Is it best for us to put our boys in the Army before they are mature men, or is it best to hold them in reserve until they are mature and can bear the arduous burdens of citizenship? If it shall be insisted upon, to my mind it is an evidence of weakness to begin with. When the last reserves of Germany were called into this great struggle, taking the youths of 16 to 18, do you not remember how the impression went forth to the world that the German power was broken—God grant that it be true—because she had called to arms boys of 16 to 18? And when Germany, France, and England, as far as possible, have reserved the young manhood of the nations for the future are we to tell the world that we place our 18-year-old boys in the field in order that the elder men may enjoy the luxuries of peace? The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and others have said that we must throw away sentiment on this question, that we must no longer have tender care for the youth of our country. Perish forever the thought. This Republic to-day would be but a colony of England if there had been no sentiment among the American people. In the very dawn of this Republic the world saw Africa slumbering in the darkness of a lost civilization. It beheld the great continent of Asia with not a single altar erected to liberty, Europe sheltering only the thrones of blood-stained monarchies. It was sentiment that then drove to the shores of New England the Mayflower, where the Puritan lifted the standard of liberty, demanding the right to work and worship God in obedience to the dictates of his own conscience.

Far down to the south, upon the banks of the James, were raised the banners of freedom, and a great people united to press civilization to the far West. Then the hand of the tyrant reached across the sea to suppress the liberties of a mighty people. It was then that the Colonies united under a sentiment that has affected the world ever since, the sentiment of freedom and justice. Without it there would have been no Declaration of Independence. Without it there would have been no Constitution and no Republic. We gave to the world the example of freedom and of democracy. We asserted the rights of men to govern themselves. We determined that every man is entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We said that no just government can exist save by the consent of the governed. Was it sentiment that drove us forth to battle for these rights? Was it sentiment that enabled the fathers of the Republic to assume that godlike spirit that raised a tottering Nation to glory? Yes; sentiment! Was it sentiment that divided this great country, one side claiming the right to constitutional liberty and the other holding to the maintenance of the Union, declaring that liberty was worth nothing and a constitution worth nothing without a republic behind it to be sustained? Sentiment sustains freedom and civilization by law and order. These are all matters of sentiment. It is sentiment to-day that places us largely in this war. We had no idea of entering this struggle, in my judgment, except as a defensive proposition on our own shores until we beheld the great commissions from foreign lands pleading for liberty and democracy for the world coming to our shores. We saw Italy, the land of Brutus and Cato; and Great Britain, glorious in her history and traditions; we beheld the beloved land of France, pleading at the altar of American liberty for help to sustain the principles of democratic government, taught since 1776 by the American people, and we answered her. We laid aside all the prejudices we had against Great Britain; we extended the hand of friendship to Italy; and we said to France, "By the eternal, the Hun shall never place his unhallowed foot in the tomb of Lafayette and his unholy hand shall not haul down the flag of France." [Applause.]

We are in this war largely as a matter of sentiment. Practically it is a sentimental war, and we must prosecute it to a successful conclusion for democracy and the freedom of men. But we can reserve the boys for the last charge; we can reserve them to the day when America must wave her banners, all her banners wave, and charge with all her chivalry. [Applause.]

We must not hesitate about this matter; we must stand for whatever is right and just, and whatever be the judgment of this committee, let us go into the House and present that judgment not by a divided vote but by one solid unit, facing the enemy and sustaining the Government and the President of the United States. Let us do the deed to-day, and dare it, and in the days to come, from our place on high, look down on to-day and yesterday as days that can never die. [Applause.]

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, it is admitted here that the military experts of the country want this bill to pass with the ages fixed at from 18 to 45. Those who support the McKenzie amendment say they are ready in most instances—ready generally—to follow the advice of the military experts, but they say that this particular question is not a military question and that they should be left to their individual congressional judgments.

I suppose they are ready to follow the advice of the expert about munitions; they are ready to follow what he says about cannon; they are ready to do what he says about supplies; they are ready to concur in what he recommends about transportation; and yet munitions, cannon, supplies are all senseless things. Without the man they do nothing. The ultimate thing, the thing which moves them all, is man power. That is the thing most important of all, and in respect to that we say to the men whom we must trust—we say to the Chief of Staff here and to the general on the firing line, "We will not trust you to select the force with which you must win this war." Could anything be more absurd than that?

And then, as if to force the argument, some one of these gentlemen says in trench fighting is not the more mature man, the man of 40, more useful than the youth? Why, have you not heard the report of those Members of this body who have returned here within two or three days from France? Have you not heard that the Americans are fighting in the open, and that while the French and English are digging in our men are showing how to hide themselves in the open fields and be safer than they would be in the houses, woods, or even trenches? You all admit that for open fighting the younger man, the man as young as 18, is the better soldier.

Next they say—the gentleman who is sponsor for this amendment says—when the Capital is in danger, when our cities are bombarded, when our people are threatened on their own shores, then I will be ready to vote that the boys of 18 go in.

One of my colleagues from New York says he will be ready under those circumstances to send 25,000,000 men and $250,000,000,000 dollars in money. Oh, gentlemen, I propose a more glorious course than that. In the last three or four weeks America has entered the fighting line on the other side. England and France, dispirited, with their morale impaired by four years of long, weary fighting, have been revivified and given new courage and, united with their new brothers in arms, they have driven the Germans back more within the last three or four weeks than they advanced in the corresponding number of months. [Applause.] And so strengthen the Army not when the flag is trailing in disaster, strengthen the Army not when our own shores are bombarded, strengthen the Army not when the Capital is in danger, but strengthen it all you can at this moment when we are going forward and thus continue to go forward and keep going forward until you win, as you will win, if you strike with all your might for a great and glorious victory. That is the time to exert your effort and not wait until disaster comes.

Then we hear a great deal about taking away the boys from the schools.

I wonder if these gentlemen have read that greatest of all military books, The Memoirs of Gen. Grant. All concede that the war of 1860–1865 was fought by the young boys, and Gen. Grant tells us in respect to the boys who were taken from the farm and from the workshops that their vision was so broadened, their experience was so valuable, that when they came back to the farm and the workshop they found them too small, and he says that the volunteer became the pioneer and that the West was settled 50 years earlier than it would have been except for the Civil War. Who needs to be and who is more hardy than the pioneer? And yet they talk to us of decadence, because these boys are conscripted now! The boys of that period, 1860–1865, became the pioneers of this country, and the boys who come from this war will become the sailors of what will become the greatest commercial fleet of any nation in the world after this war. They will go down to Central and South America, carrying our trade there, and will make those practically Anglo-Saxon countries. Our young men will so change things that South America will not alone give us its trade, to which we are naturally entitled, but it will practically become a part of us, and with its vast undeveloped natural resources it will grow and prosper beyond our dreams. They will redeem the arid lands of this country; they will redeem the forest lands that have been cut over; they will rescue the lands which are flooded, and we shall see that their great vision and their wonderful experience will make these boys the rulers of America for 50 years to come. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I was not able to procure the 10 minutes which was promised to me yesterday, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to speak for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I shall ask our efficient Doorkeeper, Mr. Sinnott, to let me have two 18-year-old pages, and I believe he has selected two, Charles Mainhall and John Doyle. They will be here in a minute.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I would like to say that I have made a hard study of this proposition. It was not my good fortune to go home during our short recess. I was here during all of that time. This enlarged draft problem began to be talked about ahead of the necessity for its being taken up by the Military Committees of the House and the Senate. The discussion then spread to the counties around the District of Columbia, where I have been from time to time talking to the patriotic people, and I began calling for 18-year-old boys to look at them. My friends, I found that the able-bodied 18-year-old boys, the husky boys, who are full grown, have pretty well gone into the Army. They have volunteered and they are doing men's work in our brave Army. I found, too, that other well-developed 18-year-old boys are doing the work at home of grown men on the farms around here, in the shipyards of Alexandria, and I know that out in my far-distant country, and everywhere, they are working and doing men's work in the woods, in the mills, in the factories, the shipyards, and wherever boys can fill in.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; the gentleman will pardon me, but I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Of the boys of the country, from 18 to 19, there are just a few more than 1,000,000. The War Department expects to card index that million and select from them 540,000 18-year-old boys, and Gen. Crowder told me this morning at my questioning that of the 540,000—and Secretary Baker himself promised to hold them back as long as possible—in spite of that promise, in spite of that pledge, it is expected to have about 300,000 of the 18-year-old boys in the trenches on the firing line within six months. Mr. Chairman, can not this great Nation with more than a hundred million souls find 300,000 men from the deferred classifications? Shall we let the son of Henry Ford, 23 years old, who applied first for a deferred classification, because he said he was needed in his father's business, go scot-free? [Applause.] He lost his first appeal, but he made a second appeal that he had a wife and baby, just born, and finally got himself put into a classification of 2A.

I want to see how many young men like Edsel Ford, son of Henry, who asked for deferred classification, because he was needed in Ford's business, are left in this land. As I say, Edsel Ford finally secured classification as 2–A (wife and child) and also as 3–1 (necessary assistant of necessary indutrial enterprise). That makes him practically immune under the old draft unless the rules are changed. And, gentlemen of the House, this new bill sends the 18-year-olds of the United States to war ahead of all the Edsel Fords in the country.

Theodore Roosevelt has written that "the son of Henry Ford ought to feel it absolutely obligatory on him to go to the war." Pass this bill and he can not go. This ends volunteering. Read the hearings on the subject. Note that enlistments are suspended. Read Secretary Baker's statement that an able-bodied man of 40 or 42 will not be permitted to enlist. Will you O. K. a plan by which a father of 40 can not give his life for his 18-year-old son? They say Henry Ford is to be inducted into the Senate. I do not believe it. [Applause.] But if he is to come, I wish he were here now, so that the Nation might see if he would vote to send poor men's 18-year-olds, while his own precious 23-year-old Edsel is set aside. [Applause.] Will you draft the 18-year-olds while a single fighting man under 31 sits in uniform at an official desk in Washington? [Applause.] If you must draft 18-year-olds, will not you at least make the draft maximum 50 years, and authorize volunteering, so that able-bodied men such as myself can get into the trenches? [Applause.] Enact these provisions, and I will enlist to-morrow, and I am only one of countless thousands. Get it down to the last analysis, and there are 150 men in this Congress who should vote themselves into this war before they vote the extreme youth of the land into it. [Applause.] Gentlemen, will you draft the golf caddies and exempt the golf players?

Gentlemen, my position is very clear in this matter. I offer an amendment, in line 2, page 2, striking out "18" and substituting "19." That can be voted up or down. I understand that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], or some member of the committee, will offer an amendment striking out all of the McKenzie amendment. Whether my amendment to keep the 18-year-olds still in the hands of Congress wins or loses, I shall vote against the McKenzie amendment. And whether that is left in or stricken out, I shall finally vote for the bill, fully conscious that I have done my full duty in attempting to perfect it by holding in reserve the 18-year-olds until the improperly deferred have been rounded up.

Gentlemen, we can make the first amendment and neither delay victory nor disturb the plans of the War Department. We simply hold in the hands of Congress 600,000 18-year-old boys until we have positive knowledge that they are needed, and until we have dug up men from certain suspended activities. These boys may become 19 before that step is necessary. There are 1,000,000 18-year-olds in the United States. If needed, House and Senate can add them to the man power of the Army in 10 days' time. [Applause.] Right now military authorities state that an additional army of 2,300,000 men is wanted. Secretary Baker himself proposes to hold until the last moment the youths from the front ranks. Gen. Crowder tells me that he thinks if all other estimates run true nearly 300,000 of the 18-year-olds proposed to be drafted by this bill can be held here for quite a period. But he says that those who do go will be likely to go within six months.

Remember, gentlemen, this is not the universal training plan. It is a draft that takes 500,000 from an available million 18-year-olds and sends fully half of that 500,000 to the trenches within six months. Now, then, gentlemen, whether we adopt the 18-year minimum or make the low draft age 19 years, we simply tie the hands of the War Department if we adopt the McKenzie amendment, as I shall show you. Mark that. But make the minimum 19, kill the McKenzie amendment, and you will not embarrass, hamper, or delay the War Department. And you withhold from the front ranks six months from now only 300,000 18-year-old boys, for whose places there can certainly be found among the 20,000,000 men of this Nation able-bodied, willing, mature patriots not now in the Army or subject to the last draft or this draft who would rather fight and die than unnecessarily sacrifice those 300,000 boys. [Applause.]

What is the McKenzie amendment? This:

That registrants who, on the date fixed by the President for registration, are of the age of 19 years and not over 20 years shall be designated as the class "19," and shall be drafted subsequent to registrants in class 1 of the age of 20 years and over the age of 20 years; and registrants of the age of 18 years and not over 19 years shall be designated as the class "18" and shall be the last called for service.

Now, please give attention. On page 45 of the House committee hearings, Gen. Crowder tells of the plans now proceeding to put this new draft act into effect. He says:

I have proceeded under one possible embarrassment, and that is a provision might be inserted in the law which would invalidate the printing I am having done * * *. Any change that is made in the law that affects the questionnaire or any other form necessary would make embarrassment for us.

And so forth.

I submit that while we are anxious to hurry this draft and get the men that Gen. Crowder, who will be in charge of the draft, wants, we can make the minimum age 19, and not hold back the new draft one hour. My proposition simply cuts off the lowest classification. In the hearings Chairman DENT asked:

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean if Congress should change the age limit, we will say, from 20 to 40 years or from 20 to 45 years?

Gen. CROWDER. That would not affect it. It is the changing of the conditions of classification that would affect it.

Gen. Crowder also added:

Now, there is one thing that I thought there might be some misunderstanding about. Already I have asked the Secretary of War to consider this proposition. Proceed with the registration of all men added by extending the military ages; give every man enrolled a serial number, conduct the drawing and assign each man an order number; then segregate the cards of the 18-year-old men, and lay them to one side, and segregate the cards for the men from 37 to 45, and lay them to one side; proceed as expeditiously as possible to classify the men of 19 and 20 years of age and the men from 32 to 36 years of age, inclusive, which would give me five annual classes of the superior age limits and two annual classes of the inferior age limits. That would enable me to move with great expedition to the recruitment of class 1. When I get them classified, I will take the superior age numbers and proceed with the men from 37 to 45 years of age. I would proceed as rapidly as possible with the men in the upper age limits. However, as yet he has made no order except that for first classifying the 19 and 20 year old boys and the men from 32 to 36 years, inclusive.

Chairman DENT then asked the question in another form:

If we should provide the order in which they should be called into service, that would not delay the execution of the law?

And Gen. Crowder answered:

No, sir; but I would not like to have you infer from that that it would not produce other embarrassments. It would not delay the execution of the law unless you told me to proceed with the superior age limits first. As I told you, the work of the classification of the men from 32 to 45 years of age is so laborious that I would not be certain of getting the number of men needed in class 1 to fill the requisition corresponding to the months of October, November, and December.

In several places in the Senate hearings you will find it stated that it can not be hoped to hold back the 18-year-olds. I have not time to mention objections which have hitherto been presented to the drafting of 18-year-olds at this stage of the man-power strength of a Nation of more than 100,000,000 people, but I have this idea to present to you. Gen. Crowder says, Senate hearings, volume 1, page 8:

Here is one thought that occurs to me (Crowder): Our 18-year-old and 19-year-old and 20-year-old boys are going over there to fight with boys who are 18 and against boys who are 18 and, if reports are to be believed, against boys who are 17, so that we are not doing anything that is unprecedented.

Oh, gentlemen, not unprecedented! Have not we all read, not with scorn but with pity, that 18-year-old prisoners have been captured by our troops at the front? I have seen those youthful German prisoners, some perhaps under 18, and I have felt that pity. And neither ourselves nor our allies starve or mistreat our prisoners. Standing beside me is one of the two 18-year-old pages employed by the House of Representatives, for whom I called. The other is detained. This boy is part of the man power of the United States, but I submit he is hardly fit for life in the trenches. [Applause.] That fine, manly little fellow does not weigh within 50 pounds of the equipment that I ask him to shoulder. He wants to go to war. Can anyone imagine this patriotic, growing boy in a charge against a gas attack? Can you see him blinded for life?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Washington may be extended for one minute, as I desire to propound a question with reference to the exhibit which the gentleman makes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Washington may be extended for one minute.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that his time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I thank the House, and I shall be glad in time to answer any question that may be propounded to me, but let me first make a statement as to the boy. This young man, a fine manly growing boy of 18, patriotic as anybody, and as anxious to go to the war as anybody, would find himself a little bit under weight; but I can fill him out in three months from his present 108 pounds to the necessary requirement. When they come to strap this paraphernalia, weighing at least 150 pounds, on this boy they need not put in the razor, because this boy has never yet shaved. A soldier! A soldier to defend the flag for us—you and me! [Applause.] I hand him that gun, that Enfield rifle. We will make a soldier of him. We put this heavy steel helmet on him. Now! Put him in the trenches, my friends, against a military nation that has long trained its boys of 16—a nation that for 40 years has schemed and planned to beat the world.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Ah, when the time comes we will put this boy in; we will put in the 16-year-olds, and gladly.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Just one minute.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman think——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman think the American boy of 18 would not be a match for the German boy of 16 who is now in the trenches?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; but as the distinguished gentleman of long experience of this House, whom we all admire for his judgment [Mr. MOON], has just stated, that very fact that Germany has called out her last reserves is a sign of weakness [applause], which we hope is true.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does the gentleman from Washington know that the page whom he presents as an exhibit has supported a widowed mother by his earnings ever since he has been a page; that she is practically blind, and that both he and his mother insist that he shall go into the war; and that he believes from actual experience he can render unusually good service in the motor-transport branch?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not doubt it. I am very glad the gentleman asks that question.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And he is ready to enlist if he is not drafted for that purpose?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. I want to ask if the gentleman who has just spoken is willing to stay at home and send that boy to war? [Loud applause.]

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I think I ought to have the right to answer the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman may answer in the gentleman's own time. [Applause.] Now, gentlemen, the question asked by our colleague from New York was perfectly proper and the statement made by him in regard to this boy supporting a widowed mother is a splendid statement, and it fits the case exactly and it is in line with what I am arguing. I contend that by the time we comb out the 540,000 18-year-olds and have heard the appeals of those who support aged parents or widowed mothers, or those who are doing full men's work, that there will not be left 540,000. And I contend, too, my friends, that this Congress should think twice before it puts upon the draft boards, these hard-working boards in each community, the decision of sending such a boy as that into the trenches or heeding his appeal that he must support a poor old mother.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman whether the young man that he has before us is a fair example of the American youth of 18 years of age?

Mr. LITTLE. You bet your life; he is above the average.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Let this boy here stand up. Here is a boy 15 years of age. Why did not the gentleman take——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let him volunteer. I said in the beginning, my friends, that thousands upon thousands of 18-year-old boys have volunteered; and only last night I met a boy from Washington Barracks—a 16-year-old boy who had lied and said he was 18 years old and who had enlisted—and while they are sending soldiers to France right now from Washington Barracks, they are holding back that 16-year-old boy. He is sore, angry, disappointed. That will happen——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A few statements about sentiment have crept into this debate. We all love and admire our patriotic Chaplain, Dr. Henry Couden, the blind Chaplain of the House, who stands here each day and offers prayer. You know his history; how at the age of 20 years he was shot and lost his sight while fighting in the desperate War between the States. Blinded in battle at 20 years, for more than 50 years he has made his way as the result of that war. Put this boy in the trenches of France, send him against not the bullets of civilized warfare as in the former desperate War between the States, but against poisoned gas! See him, as I have seen thousands over there, blinded for life! Gentlemen, do you not think we had better comb out the sons of the Henry Fords and others and examine the deferred classes before we draft the 18-year-olds? [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. You have got it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Gentlemen, I thank you for your attention, and I am very much obliged to you. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to agree with my friend from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] in one thing, at least, and that is in opposition to the McKenzie amendment. I agree with him for the reason expressed substantially by him that it would seriously impede our progress in making the fastest and best preparation for putting a speedy conclusion to the war. And I am standing by the officials of the War Department in this matter simply because I believe that they are right and advocating the best policy. I would get away as quickly and as far as possible from the idea that simply because the War Department proposes anything we must follow it without consideration. None of us should stand for that. This is a matter for legislative action. It is our proper function as Representatives to pass upon it.

I believe the bill as presented by the War Department, without this amendment, presents the best way to mobilize our resources in man power. Most of the argument on this amendment has been against the use of young men under 21 for military service. This amendment does not prevent that at all. It is not claimed by its author or any of its advocates that this amendment will save the young men even down to 18 from early service. It seeks only to fix the order of their going. All this talk about "children" 18 years old is arrant nonsense. We all know that, from our common, everyday experience. As a rule, boys when they reach the age of 18 are not children, and they do not act like children. Such a statement is an aspersion upon two or three hundred thousand young men of 20 years and under who are already in the service, and on their behalf I resent it.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. I will yield for a single question.

Mr. BLANTON. If they are not children at 18 years old, why is it the law of the land says they are children until they get to be 21?

Mr. TILSON. In the first place, the law does not say that.

Mr. BLANTON. The law says they can not make a contract.

Mr. TILSON. That is right. However, I do not intend to allow myself to be diverted from the line of my remarks by a number of questions at this time.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield? Will you name a single industry in which 18-year-old boys rank with men of 30?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know what the gentleman means by "industry."

Mr. MEEKER. All activities like war activities. Name one.

Mr. TILSON. Regardless of what rank they occupy in industry or anything else, we know from experience in our own country that they do make fine soldiers. They tested that out in the Civil War, on both sides of the Mason and Dixon line, and no one can dispute the fact that they did make good soldiers. They have always made the best of soldiers, and no one in this presence dare deny it.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] has just exhibited here an undersized boy of 18 and puts on him an oversize uniform. By so doing he attempts to make ridiculous the idea of using in the military service a young man of 18 years of age. It is admitted by my friend from Washington that the page boy he has exhibited is undersize, underweight, and of course he would not be accepted for service. I wish to show you just exactly what an ordinary man of 18 looks like, who has been accepted and is now in the service. In the Speaker's section in the gallery there are four marines 18 years old. I might add by way of parenthesis that a very considerable proportion of the marines now in the service are under 21 years of age. I will ask the young men of 18 years of age in the Speaker's section of the gallery to stand up.

Thereupon the marines referred to arose and were greeted with loud applause.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman state how long they have been in the service?

Mr. TILSON. I do not happen to have their service record. Men like these are the ones from whom we heard such good reports on the Marne salient some weeks ago, the young men who drove back some of the best troops of Germany, whether they were men or boys.

I say it is all nonsense to talk about "children" of that age. They are young men. They are at the time of life when they can help fight for their country; they are eager to fight for their country, and pray who has a greater stake or interest in it to fight for?

The time has come when we should amass our strength ready to strike the enemy a tremendous and irresistible blow. The Germans are now moving in the right direction, and we should keep them moving in that direction. We can not do it if we tie the hands of the military authorities and say that they can not take a certain part of the man power until they take the rest of it; that they can not take these young men of 18 to 20 until they take all the older men up to 45. We can not afford to do that, gentlemen. War is serious business. It is a crime that any of our men must go to war, but the guilt for that crime lies not at the door of our country.

Now, what does this amendment say? I wish to call your attention to a fact which was admitted by the chairman of the committee in his opening remarks when his attention was called to it by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON]. In case this amendment is adopted all registrants, everybody, from 20 to 45, married, with dependents, employed in industries, essential or not, all registrants, must be taken before any of those below 20 can be taken.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. The language speaks for itself.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TILSON. I will yield to one question from my friend.

Mr. GORDON. Do you seriously contend here that this repeals the exemption provisions of the draft law which we amended so as to authorize the President to exempt anybody who had dependents?

Mr. TILSON. Let me read to the gentleman what it says:

All registrants—

There is no exception. It says:

All registrants of the age of 20 years and above on the day fixed by the President for registration shall be called——

Mr. GORDON. Called and exempted or put in the service.

Mr. TILSON (reading):

shall be called prior to those in the classes hereby created.

So we must call all registrants above 20 and up to 45 before we can take any of the lower classes. That is what it says.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. FIELDS. On page 2, lines 20 and 21, it says that it refers to class 1. It makes it perfectly clear.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; but the last paragraph is clear the other way. The first paragraph seems to indicate what the gentleman says, but the last paragraph, which speaks last, says that all registrants must be called before any of the younger men may be taken.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. McKENZIE. I simply wish to state to my colleague that it was not my purpose in the amendment to carry out any such policy as he has enunciated, and it is my purpose when this debate ends to ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by inserting the words "class one" in the last line of the amendment, so that there will be no doubt about it.

Mr. TILSON. I was speaking to the amendment as it stands. That is what it now says and that is what it means. I do not believe the House will stand for any such proposition as that. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for two minutes more. I want to ask a question in order to get some information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut may proceed for two minutes more in order that he may ask him a question. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOOD. The question I am asking is purely for information and not to bother the gentleman or trouble him in any way. Now, about two months ago the Secretary said this:

> The present provision for drafting men between the ages of 21 and 31 satisfies military requirements, and there is no need whatever to look beyond those ages now or in the near future.

The Secretary of War, in closest touch with all the offices in the Military Establishment, in the War Department, said that there was no need now nor in the near future to enlarge and take in younger men. Now, what has happened since that time that would make such a change as to require our taking men not only 20 years but men of 19 and men even of 18? It bothers me a little bit.

Mr. TILSON. Well, in the first place, the Secretary has a perfect right to change his mind and change his opinion for good reason, and undoubtedly he has done so on that question. A number of things have occurred since that time. The great drive by the enemy toward the Marne and across it has taken place. The great counterdrive of Foch has taken place and is still taking place satisfactorily. An allied conference at Paris has taken place, and a number of other things have taken place, sufficient to cause a man to change his mind.

Mr. GOOD. But the Secretary of War had just returned from the battle front when he made that statement. He knew that the drive was in progress. He knew, or ought to have known, all these things; and I am at a loss, as a civilian, to understand how men can change their minds on so important a thing without giving their reasons for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has again expired. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is recognized.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, with respect to one proposition there is no division in this Chamber—this House will do whatever is necessary to win this war. There is every inclination on my part to support the War Department and the Navy Department in whatever they deem to be best, and I am ready to make whatever sacrifice is necessary in order to crush the German monster, and I believe that statement finds an echo in the heart of every man in this Chamber. But I can not bring my mind to the conclusion that it is necessary to take the 18-year-old boys at this time. [Applause.]

Congress will be here. The probabilities are that we will be here for some time to come, and then some time after that; and if it shall be deemed necessary later on to take the 18-year-old boys, we will put them in the ranks of the Army, because we are all ready, I believe, to support the constituted authorities to the limit in winning this war. But I can not believe that out of 100,000,000 population it is necessary right now to take the 18-year-old boys and put them in the ranks of the Army, and until greater necessity has been shown than has appeared up to this time, until the President shall proclaim such necessity, speaking for myself, I can not support that proposition.

Mr. Chairman, it is with exceeding regret that I find myself out of harmony with the War Department in this respect. I am one of those who take pride in admitting that I am glad to support the constituted authorities in whatever they deem best, and it is, as I have said, with very great regret that I find myself unable to agree with the recommendation of the War Department with respect to the taking of the 18-year-old boys.

This proposition comes with great suddenness. A few weeks ago, less than six weeks ago, the statement was published that any new draft would probably not go below 21; probably, indeed, not below 20; certainly there was not even a suggestion that boys of 18 would be asked for. Now suddenly we are confronted with the proposal to take the 18-year-old boys and send them across the water after a brief training, possibly after a few months, to take their places with older men on the firing line. Since this proposition was submitted I have made it a point to investigate for myself the military fitness of the 18-year-old boy, and, while it does not concern me personally, for my home already is empty and silent, I can not bring myself to the conclusion that it is right at this time to make this sacrifice, and with genuine regret I can not now follow to the limit the recommendation of the War Department. [Applause.]

The question is, Shall we send minors to the front while thousands of mature men who could go are exempted and allowed to remain at home? If there is a father in this Chamber with a boy in France who would not gladly take that boy's place if he could he is not worthy to be a Member of this House.

We in framing the new draft law must choose between the minor, the 18-year-old boy, and the shirker and slacker. To me my duty is plain. Until the President, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, shall proclaim that the hour has come for the 18-year-old boys to go, for my part I can not by my vote make those boys go. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, men do not long linger on life's stage of action. It is given to those in this Chamber to take part in making laws for this Nation in the most tragic days in the history of the world. How cheap any suggestion of politics or personal interest becomes beside the great things we are called upon to do!

I hope and pray that one word only shall guide my action now—duty. Nothing else counts. What is our duty? As God gives me light to see, I shall do what seems to be right, and I wish to put this upon record. Those who conspired to bring on this war and drench the world in blood should be exterminated just as every mad dog is shot at the first opportunity. The world knows who the conspirators are. But in bringing these conspiring robbers and murderers to justice let us send forth our mature manhood before calling for the 18-year-old boys. France, glorious France, invaded and drenched in blood, has not yet ordered her 18-year-old boys to the firing line. Here in America in every community there are grown men who ought to go before the boys are sent. This is not sentiment; this is not the response to some frantic mother's appeal, and you all know it is not. It is the plain, unvarnished truth. Look around your own home. I venture the assertion that every Member here can think of some grown man who could go, who ought to go, before the strippling boys.

Some weeks ago I saw a regiment marching from Fort Myer with packs on each soldier's back on the way to take a train for a point of embarkation for Europe. I watched those men as they marched by. Not one was marching erect, no doubt in compliance with orders. But everyone was marching with head bowed down as a man does when carrying a heavy burden. The day was warm and the sweat was running down the cheeks of everyone of those brave men. Of course there are boys of 19 and even 18 who are stronger than most of the men I saw in that regiment, but the average youth is not.

For these and other reasons, Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to give my vote in support of that part of the pending measure which provides for drafting the boys of 18. If we exempt these lads now we can call for them next month if it shall be deemed necessary by the President and the War Department.

This much we do know, the President is just as anxious to keep the boys at home as we are. He is just as tenderly solicitous of the welfare of every American boy as any father in the Nation. I know he will not call for these boys unless he feels it to be his solemn duty.

Mr. Chairman, from the McLemore resolution to the bill now being considered without a break I have supported the President in prosecuting the war. After this bill has been considered in the Committee of the Whole I shall give it my whole-hearted support also. I feel that we who prefer not to draft the 18-year-old boys at this time are right in the position we have taken, but if we fail in our efforts to write our convictions in the bill for one I shall give it my hearty support. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there are considerations that would favor the drafting of the 18-year-old boys. There are other considerations against it. Earnestly and honestly I think the Members are studying to know what the specific duty of a Member of Congress is at this time.

It seemed strange to me when I read that out of 10,000,000 men between the ages of 31 and 45 there could be secured but 600,000 men. There are unmarried men between those ages approximately two and one-half millions, and between the ages of 40 and 31 there are 2,000,000 unmarried men in this country. And then I remember that the deferred class has not been gone into between the ages of 21 and 31.

Sentiment, it is true, on questions of this kind should not dominate; but it would seem to me that both reason and sentiment are against going down to the 18-year limit. This does not affect me or mine personally. My own boys are beyond the 21-year age. Yet I remember that of the four boys who grew up in my own home, while one of them was short of stature the others, even at 15 or 18 years of age, were tall and apparently rugged and strong; but I do not forget that they lacked the judgment, the care, that ought to characterize men when they are put upon the arduous duties such as the soldier has to perform. So that it would seem wise to remember that if this contest shall be long-drawn-out the boys in the technical schools, in the medical schools, in the dental schools, and in the various colleges would be serving their country best in making that adequate preparation for taking the places of the professional men that we shall need. If it be but an exigency and the time be short, it would seem wise that we should not thrust into the life of a boy the need of disrupting his education. So that there is certainly some reason against reducing the draft age to the 18-year limit.

Strange, is it not, that with a people of 100,000,000 we are driven in less than a year and a half to take this step? It is under necessity, men say. If I could think that it is necessity, I would not say a word; I would vote willingly and anxiously and gladly to go down even to the boy of 16.

But, men, after an analysis of the figures, do you believe that we have reached any such emergency that we are justified in reaching down to the 18-year-old boy? I know they say it would be difficult to mobilize and classify those from 31 to 45. Who is to blame that under an emergency, suddenly, with a few hours of discussion, we are to thrust the boys into the trenches and let the men go, just because it will interfere a little with a rapid enrollment in the cantonments? I can not believe it is so serious as to justify the taking of boys rather than the taking of men of older age.

I am not unaware that sentiments of humanity enter into all of our hearts. And yet I have tried in a simple way to make such analysis as I deemed would justify opposing the taking of the 18-year-old boy. I doubt very seriously whether it is either wise or necessary to drop below 21 at this time. However, that is a matter of judgment.

Then I remember, too, that in the Senate bill in the beginning the effort was to reach down and take the boys. And while it is said that these boys will be in a deferred classification, or rather will be called later, you know and I know that it is the intention of the War Department to take 1,200,000 of them quickly, for they do not expect to get more than 600,000 from the other class. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that I took no time in general debate I should like to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I take it there is not a Member of this body, or any other mature American citizen, who would not gladly give up his own life rather than take from the homes of this land the fathers, the brothers, and the sons of whatever age or condition in life. I hardly think it is fair to base this proposition to-day entirely on the sentimental picture that can be painted of the taking from any home of any man, whether the youth of 18 or the mature man of 40. Such picture may appeal to our feeling, but should not determine our vote on this question. This is a question of expediency and policy.

When the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and the Chief of Staff made up their minds that the only way to fight this war was by enacting the conscription act, many of us followed them implicitly, knowing that they had not made up their minds to any such drastic legislation as that without thoroughly canvassing every phase of the question. Personally I believe we made a mistake then in not putting into training under the terms of that original act the boys of 18, 19, 20, and 21. But in deference to a sentiment in this country which was not used to that kind of legislation we were all of us glad to change our position on the draft age and submit to a compromise at that time. When the President of these United States, through his advisors, came before our committee, I know the President has not changed his mind, that the Secretary of War has not changed his mind, and that Gen. March has not changed his mind as to the necessity without some overwhelming reason which has urged them to this conclusion. And in answer to the question of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], do we not all realize that these men in the last 60 days have a picture of what has happened in France, where our boys met the shock of battle of the trained legions of Germany, and where in the open they find that by the greatest stress and the greatest loss and the greatest bravery they have been able to hold and push back that German line, and that now is the time to strike, while the iron is hot, and that their great argument for using the unlimited resources of the man power of this country is not the fact that perhaps in a year or two years we might be able to comb these deferred classifications and get a sufficient number of men, but that if they are to be of the utmost utility in this crisis the men whom they send should be those whom they can get the most quickly from the body of our citizenship, in order that we may take advantage of this drive which has been made, which has demonstrated to our people that our men can stand up against these trained legions, has demonstrated to the German people that they are not invincible, and has to that extent destroyed the morale of their army. Do you not know that the President and the Secretary of War know that some of our regiments have suffered greater casualties in this drive than any regiment or organization ever suffered in the same length of time during any war in which we have been engaged?

I did not want to take the youth of our land for any other purpose than training, and still hope we may be able to give the younger men at least a full year of training in this country; but these men know the conditions, and they have said to us, "We can do it more quickly this way than in any other way," and we have hedged this legislation about by such necessary provisions as, I think, make it fair and just to all our citizenship.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I dislike very much to interrupt the gentleman's argument, but he says these men know and we know that certain great casualties have happened to certain regiments which never happened in any other similar contest. I do not know it, and up until this moment I am yet to be informed that any calamity has happened to any American regiment in that drive. If it has happened I will go the whole distance, but we have not been advised of it.

Mr. CRAGO. Let me answer the gentleman's question. If you lived in my home town, where they received the intelligence Tuesday morning, a week ago, family after family, until 13 of our families in that community and in that small town of 5,000, from which a company of the National Guard had gone out, had received death notices, and others had received notices of wounded loved ones, you would realize what such news means to our people. I have kept in close touch with all of our Pennsylvania regiments. I do not want to be too explicit. I know what the casualties are, because my heart has been following them all the time. I know something of what has been going on over there, and so do the men who have been studying the strategy of this movement, who know what it has cost, and I am urging this only because I think we can trust the Secretary of War and the President not to ask for any legislation which would needlessly tear from the homes of our land any of the youth who are not needed and who are not most needed at this time.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I do not doubt that what the gentleman has pictured has happened in my own neighborhood.

Mr. CRAGO. Unfortunately it has.

Mr. GALLIVAN. But the gentleman implied that whole regiments had been practically wiped out. Now, if that is so, we want to know it. If there has been any calamity, the American people ought to be told about it. I do not know yet how I am going to vote on this proposition. I am following every speech.

Mr. CRAGO. I shall want more time.

Mr. GALLIVAN. The gentleman yielded.

Mr. CRAGO. I do not care to yield all my short time. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, however, that I do not want to leave him under the impression that regiments have been entirely wiped out.

Mr. GALLIVAN. That is what I want to know.

Mr. CRAGO. But I merely said there had been greater casualties in the same length of time than in any other war in which we had been engaged.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I want it made clear that there have not been whole regiments wiped out. If the gentleman knows it, or if the War Department knows it, Congress ought to know it.

Mr. CRAGO. The records of the War Department will give the correct information to the gentleman.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. I will.

Mr. MEEKER. Can the gentleman explain why when the men in class 2 have long expected to be called they are not called?

Mr. CRAGO. I hardly think that is the case, but I will agree to any legislation that can be enacted that will comb every classification, and deferred classifications especially, and put into the ranks men who really belong there. I do not care how drastic it may be. I have no sympathy, only pity, for a man within the draft age who is using any disguise whatever to evade service, because he will have visited on him in future years the consciousness that he did not do his duty and the condemnation of his fellow citizens, which will be infinitely worse than any hardships resulting from service he can render the country at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman speaks about the loss of the Pennsylvania regiment. Does not the gentleman know that the German losses have been so much greater than the American that the Americans remain proportionately stronger than the Germans?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes; but we are having a wastage of troops which must be filled up. I grant you that a larger army could be formed in time from the deferred classifications, but not in time to suit the purposes of the department and meet the present demand. I think that is one reason why they did not want any restrictions put on the right to use the man power of this country, in order that they might the more quickly secure and place in training the necessary number of troops. The brightest ray of hope I had in all the testimony before the committee was when Gen. March, the man who knows thoroughly the real situation, said, "Give us the force from which to draw and we will form an army that will go through the German lines at will and end this war in 1919." I think that ought to impress us and make us conclude that it is far better to do something we may not want to do now, in the hope that we may not extend the war over a long period and eventually have to draw more citizens to the colors.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. I wish to ask the gentleman, as a member of the Military Committee, a question. I find on page 4 of the report, in study No. 1, that the total number of males between the ages of 32 and 40 are 6,960,532.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEWALT. I find by the same study that there are deferred as married men 5,311,952. Now, I turn to page 7 of the same report and I find that between the ages of 32 and 45 there are a total number of males of 10,020,973, and I find that in the deferred class in that same study there are placed 7,734,482. I ask the gentleman purely for information and not as a matter of argument, because I am seeking light and want to vote intelligently—I ask the gentleman, as a member of the Military Committee, where lies this fault in this large number of deferred classes of married men; and, further, if the number of deferred married men is not the fault of the local boards by discrimination in favor of some people as against others, and therefore they have not combed out the men who really should be in the draft? Then, further, if that be true, would it not be so that the 18 and 19 year old boys would not be needed?

Mr. CRAGO. I have not made myself plain if I have not answered that question. The fault is partly in the local boards, because this law, like all other laws, is administered by human agency. I think I have heard about as many complaints regarding men who have been taken who should not have been taken as I have of men who have been deferred who should not have been deferred. There has been a difference in the action of the local boards. The regulations have been changed and the boards have taken newspaper reports for the attitude of the administration as far as putting married men in the deferred class is concerned.

The law never contemplated that a man should be placed in a deferred class simply because he was married. It should have been marriage coupled with dependency. We admit that the combing should be done in time, and that it might produce a great many men; but it is said, and I believe justly, that you can not back track on all the work which has been done and put the men in training as quickly as you can take the whole body of men covered by this bill and from them form this vast army which will end this war. I will join anyone in providing a way for combing these deferred classes and putting every man in training who belongs there.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is it not a fact that the exemption figures are not made by the local boards but made up in the War Department, and does not that show that out of 10,000,000 men above the age of 32 they can get only 400,000 men?

In the gentleman's opinion, are not those figures made for the purpose of showing that they must take these boys from 18 to 19?

Mr. CRAGO. That is partly true; but the gentleman will remember this fact, that as the age increases the percentage of exemptions would necessarily be greater than it was at the lower ages, because of the industries and because of the dependents, and because of the fact that these men were so thoroughly articulated in the industries of the country.

Let me touch just briefly on another phase of the question and I am through; and I think, at the risk of being considered personal, I ought to give this little bit of testimony upon the matter of the service of the boys below age in the armies of the United States. In 1898, in my home town, it was my province to practically select the boys who formed a company which went for a year and a half of service to the Philippines; and they saw service there under more unsanitary conditions than can ever befall our boys in this present conflict. It was a little war, as wars go, but a year and a half of service combating disease in the Tropics is not anything to be passed by in a study of endurance and fitness of men for soldiers. I asked all of the married men in my company to remain at home; some, however, insisted on going. I asked practically all of the men over 25 years of age to remain at home. I had in that company a majority of boys who were not yet of age, and most of them not over 19 years old. I took, at the request of one of the most prominent citizens of our town, his boy, who was only 16 years of age. I had one boy 15 and others 17 and 18. I watched those boys. They came back, and are to-day honored citizens of the communities in which they live. They stood up under their work; they carried heavier loads than are given as equipment to the soldiers of to-day, because then they carried at times more than 100 rounds of the old Springfield ammunition as against the comparatively light ammunition of to-day. I watched those men, and I was convinced that the boys 17, 18, 19, and 20 make better soldiers when properly drilled, disciplined, and equipped than the men who are older, who could not inure themselves to discipline and to new surroundings, and to do away with the comforts of home. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAGO. I have taken up this phase of the question just from a personal point of view and observation, and I do not think it is any hardship on these boys and young men; and there is another phase of it that we have not looked at yet, and that is the fact that while there are boys 18 and 19 who should not be taken into the service—and I grant that—they will not be taken; but the great majority of American boys at that age, while it may interfere somewhat with their education unless the educational idea is carried along with it, are anxious and willing to take a part in this great world war, and they can scarcely wait to get a chance to get into the proper arm of the service. They have not been allowed to any great extent in the past to enlist, and they say that the greatest opportunity of their lives is passing them by. Ah, but, you say, you are taking them away from the moral environment of the home, and I say to you in return that the moral environments of the average cantonment and of the cantonments and camps and of the trenches in France are far higher than in a city or a large town in these United States of ours. [Applause.] You say to me that they can not stand the physical strain; and I say in that connection that you should remember the testimony of Secretary

Baker, that he saw these boys in Europe, and that he never saw one of them, either at play or at war in the trenches or wherever he saw him, but that he was proud to claim him as an American soldier. Many of those boys over there are only 19 years old who to-day have met this shock of battle. They were 18 when they went away from their homes, and they were drafted into the service of the United States out of the National Guard, where they had volunteered and enlisted at 18 and often under. You say to me that these boys 18, 19, and 20 can not stand the physical strain, and I say to you that the great, strenuous football games of the country which we have witnessed in the past few years have been fought to a finish not by men of 23 and 24 and 25, but by boys 18 and 19 and 20 [applause]; and the men who are doing much of the heavy work in the mines and in the mills of the country are the boys who are put out at 16 to earn their own living for themselves and for their families, and they are often much better off in the Army of the country, physically, mentally, and morally, than they can possibly be in this heavy work of theirs in the mines and in the factories. You are thinking too much of the boy who is mollycoddled at home. You are not thinking of the real red-blooded American youth of 18 who has been out for years making a living for himself and his family.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman stated that he preferred that the 18 and 19 year old boys should have been put in at first?

Mr. CRAGO. In training; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman if he would prefer that the casualties which have already occurred in his little home town should have been with boys 18 and 19 years of age rather than among older men?

Mr. CRAGO. No. The casualties were all mixed, and some of the boys were only 19. I would not want that, and I know the gentleman would not want that, and that only brings up another phase of it. Do not let us draw the line too close; do not segregate the boys of 18, 19, and 20 to a class of their own, because I would rather have the boys 18 and 19 and 20 and 21 and on up to 30 mixed in one organization than to have the organization composed entirely, I will say frankly, of boys 17 or 18 years of age. [Applause.]

Now, I think in view of this none of us can afford to put any restrictions upon what is asked for at this time by the men in whom we have confidence, the men to whom the country is looking to win this war for us. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] cites the football players of the country under 21 years of age as illustrative of the physical fitness of our boys for military duty. If it were proper for us to pass class legislation so as to send to the front all of our boys from 18 to 21 who are physically fit for playing that game, I believe I would be willing to support such a proposition. But we are not talking about athletes now. We are talking about the average American boy who at that tender age is not, as a rule, sufficiently developed, either mentally or physically, to go up against the trained, mature, and barbarous Hun.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure that it is not necessary for me to say that I want everything done that can be done to win this war as speedily and as gloriously as possible. I do not believe that there is a single Member of this great body of patriotic Americans who has any other thought or any other feeling. If there is he ought to be expelled from this Chamber and sent home in everlasting disgrace. [Applause.] I am willing that my record on these war questions in this Congress shall speak for itself. I do not desire to apologize for a single vote I have cast or a single sentence I have spoken in debate. I was actuated in it all by my best judgment with the best light I had at the time, and under like circumstances I would do and say the same things again. I am for the McKenzie amendment, because it is a step in the direction of what I think should be done and the best that seems possible to accomplish under existing conditions, but I shall also vote for the amendment which is to be offered fixing the minimum age limit at 21 and then at 20 and then at 19.

I believe in military preparedness, and I think we have nearly all been very remiss in our duty in that regard. If the proposition were to take these boys from 18 up to 20 and give them a certain amount of military training—say so many days a month—without interfering with the completion of their education or their present vocations in life, so that if the war is prolonged until they reach the proper military age they would be ready and fit to go to the colors when needed, I should heartily favor that.

These boys are to be the fathers, the business and professional men, of the next generation and must take our places in the halls of legislation and assume the responsibilities of all of the great functions of our Government. The character-forming period of the life of the average boy is from 18 to 21 years. During that period he needs parental care and guidance and the ennobling influence of home life. As has been truthfully said, this is really his birthright and should not be denied him except as a last resort. To take these boys now and give them hurried training and send them overseas would seriously interfere with their school life, which is so vitally important to them as well as to the future of our country. We do not permit these boys to participate in the affairs of our Government by voting, which is, of course, based upon the theory that they have not reached that state of mental maturity which renders them capable of casting an intelligent vote. Should we ask them to fight before the older men when we deny them the privilege of voting? Mr. Chairman, this is a man's war and it should be fought out first by men and then supplemented by boys if necessary, and even by women if the men and boys can not win it, for they, too, have shown that they can fight and die for liberty just as men do. I was much impressed awhile ago by the remarks of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] in connection with which he presented to the House the youth who has just passed his eighteenth birthday. I do not believe that there is a single Member of this body, with the possible exception of Uncle JOE CANNON, who could not outpoint that boy in any physical contest in which he might engage with him, and I am not so sure but that even Uncle Joe might come out of it the master. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. Oh, no; the gentleman knows that I can not yield in the short time I have—well, yes; I will yield to the gentleman. What is it he wishes to ask me?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does the gentleman think that the Secretary of War or any local board would send that boy to battle?

Mr. LANGLEY. Well, I am not so sure about that. I think I have seen some no better equipped than this boy appears to be who have been passed and put in class 1, and who are now already on the other side of the water fighting. Let me say to the gentleman that during the past year I have seen at different points of embarkation for the camps young men who, although 21 years of age, were mere striplings of boys in appearance. I have seen the tears trickling down their cheeks, and I knew it was because of their immaturity——

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he saw boys crying because they had to go away?

Mr. LANGLEY. No; not from any lack of patriotism or lack of desire to serve their country. They responded nobly and cheerfully to the country's call, and their fathers and mothers bowed in patriotic submission. The point I was seeking to make when the distinguished gentleman from New York interrupted me was that these young men, although 21 years of age, had had practically no contact with the world, many of them having never been away from their own immediate sections of the State, and yet the Government was preparing to send them across the water, thousands of miles away from home, to grapple with a trained and experienced foe and to encounter dangers and horrors contrived by expert and scientific brutes in human form, of the terrors of which they had only a faint conception. It has never been my high privilege to witness a more sublime exhibition of love of country and self-sacrifice than I witnessed on these occasions; and it planted in my heart a firm resolve that if there was ever a renewal of the attempt that was made last year to send still younger boys before the older ones were sent I would fight it at the risk of retirement to political obscurity. And I am carrying out that resolve to-day. Let me not be misunderstood. We will win this war. We must win it. Our duty to our families, to our country, to our God, and to ourselves demands it. We want no compromise, either, no inconclusive peace or peace without complete victory. Germany and her allies have done too much damage to humanity, to civilization, to get off so lightly. Our sacrifices have been too great to stop now. We must whip them until they say: "We have had enough. What are your terms?" And I want to see those terms dictated by America and the allies and in Berlin, and I hope they will include the dismemberment of the German Empire and its merciless and sacrilegious ally, the dual monarchy, and the annihilation of the unspeakable Kaiser and his bloodthirsty war lords, so that the Hohenzollerns and Hapsburgs will be only a revolting memory. And I hope, too, Mr. Chairman, that Kentucky will have the proud privilege of aiding in the enforcement of that edict. [Applause.] If, as a last resort, it becomes necessary to send every man, old or young, fat or lean, who can carry a gun, or wield a bayonet, or pull a trigger, or throw a hand grenade, or drive a tank, or steer a flying machine, or build a road or bridge, or do anything else to crush the enemies of civilization and republican government it will be done, and no American citizen will say amen to it with more patriotic fervor than I will. As gentlemen will remember, I spoke and voted against the draft law of last year. It may be contended that I was wrong, but I thought I was right and that we ought to first give the volunteer system a trial. Those of us who took that view of it were outvoted, and since that time I have, both by voice and vote, done what I could to aid the legally constituted authorities of our Government in enforcing and carrying out the spirit and purpose of that law. I want to see it carried out justly, fairly, and mercifully by administering it with absolute impartiality, sending first to the front those whose going will cause the least sorrow and suffering. If any local board or any other official has departed one iota from this manifest purpose of the law, no punishment could be too severe for such a crime.

Mr. Chairman, I had an experience in my State a few days ago that I shall never forget. I visited, at their request, an old man and his wife in their mountain home. They told me that they had three boys, one 22, one 25, and one 27, all in the service, and that they had two more boys left, one of 20 and the other nearly 18. They told me that in the same neighborhood there was a man, a great big double-fisted fellow, who could easily whip two Germans in single-handed combat, who was above the draft age and single. The father said to me while the mother sobbed: "Can not you Congressmen fix it some way or other so that that man can go first and let our two baby boys stay with us a little while longer?" That appeal touched my heart, as it would have touched yours. It does seem to me, gentlemen of the committee, that there ought to be, and can be, some method devised whereby we can, without detriment to our country's cause in this war, send first our older and maturer men with less home obligations and duties. I think the heartstrings of the patriotic mothers of our land have been torn enough for the present. Let us who are able to do so share more of their sorrows and burdens. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I have no exhibit such as was offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] with which to appeal to sympathy nor any exhibit like that offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] to cause an outburst of patriotic sentiment. Therefore what I shall say will probably prove uninteresting to this committee. Let me preface my remarks by saying I have no share in that sentiment sometimes carelessly expressed which seems to impugn the patriotism of gentlemen who have differed from other gentlemen in the course of this debate. I assume that each man here is as patriotic as any other man and frankly gives expression to the views which his conscience dictates and which his duty to his country directs him to voice. Let me say, and I can say this without the least stricture or criticism of any great department of Government, and it is surely not my purpose to criticize any department. I think it may legitimately be inferred from the history we have made and from procedure we have already witnessed that the War Department has an idea almost akin to the one expressed some years ago by Dr. Osler, that men of a certain age ought to be killed, because they are worthless, at least for military purposes.

In other words, in the very initial stages of this war and preparation for this war the War Department clearly emphasized its view that no man should be taken as a soldier who was over 25 years of age. That was the limit fixed, and I grant the perfect right of the War Department to suggest that age limit, but this House did not see fit to act in harmony with and accept the recommendation of that great department. Now, I believe I may infer one other thing. I believe we are warranted in reaching another conclusion from the course which has been pursued and from what we have heard so frequently here today. I believe that in view of the conduct of the War Department we are justified in concluding that the War Department has determined, as far as in its power lies, to see to it that the minimum number of soldiers over 31 years of age shall follow that flag. I believe I am justified in saying that the War Department has diligently sought to organize and enroll into the Army the largest number of those who are nearest 21 and the minimum number of those who are nearest 31. So I believe I may go further and conclude, judging future action by past action, that the War Department, under the bill which we are now considering, will attempt to recruit the Army to the maximum strength authorized out of the men of minimum ages to the exclusion of men of higher ages.

I believe that, without any thought of wrongdoing but in harmony with its well-known policy of securing young men for military duty, the War Department has left entirely too many men between the ages of 21 and 31 in the second, third, and fourth classes. I believe there are too many men all over this country and in the city of Washington of military age who have been exempted either permanently or temporarily from service. And I further think that unless this Congress takes decisive action, whatever the law may be, the War Department will seek to obtain the younger man to the exclusion of the older man. I believe Congress has a right to determine the military age of its soldiers, and I believe the War Department ought to execute the will of Congress, even if it does involve a surrender of its own judgment. We are expected to surrender our individual judgment, not once only but many times, and have done so frequently. Reference was made here a moment ago by the gentleman from Iowa to the fact that but recently the Secretary of War announced that there was no occasion now and would not be in the near future for a change in the draft ages. And yet to-day we are told——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more, and I will conclude in that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER. And yet within a very short time Congress is asked to raise the age to 45 and lower it to 18. Gentlemen say that the Secretary of War has the right to change his opinion, as, of course, he has. But the question has been pertinently put, what great event has occurred, what great national event has arisen, which causes the Secretary of War to change his opinion? And some one has suggested in reply that whole armies had been swept out of existence. But if the press, which, being under censorship ought to be reliable, tells us the truth, for the last four weeks, ever since the Secretary of War returned from the war zone up to this very day—ever since our boys have gone to the front, we have been whipping the "Dutch" like the devil and they are retreating at this very hour. They are running so fast, if the reports which the War Department permits us to read are true, that the army we recruit under this bill will never be able to overtake the German army until Pershing has driven them way beyond the city of Berlin. I do not believe our new recruits will ever catch them. But here is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE], which I think is deceiving all of its advocates and deceiving the gentleman, the patriotic, able, and distinguished gentleman who is its author. I do not think it will accomplish what he thinks it will. My judgment is that it only ties the hands of the administration without bringing relief to the class which he seeks to protect for ultimate reserve forces, should they eventually be needed. Therefore, I am going to vote against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE]. I shall vote against it because at most it simply ties the hands of and confuses and embarrasses the administration. It does not exempt the 18-year-old boy or the 19-year-old boy from military duty, and perhaps it ought not to do so.

But I want to go one step further and say that during my recent visit to my district I talked with people who had seen the newspaper forecast of this legislation, and I said to many of them that in my opinion Congress would not reduce the age below 19. I found strong opposition to drafting men under 19 years of age. I have had letters from many of my constituents. Every one is a protest against drafting the boy of 18. So, if I should take those letters as an expression of sentiment, I would be led to believe that the sentiment of my district is in opposition to drafting boys of 18 and, perhaps, of 19. But, Mr. Chairman, I know that there is another sentiment in that district, the great sentiment, a sentiment which thrills the hearts of every man and woman in it regardless of political affiliations, and that is that they want me as their representative to do everything that can be done to sustain the administration and help the administration to accomplish those things which will bring this war to a speedy conclusion. And, believing that way, I am going to stand by the President, but I am not going to follow every official in the War Department, when it comes to details, in their sudden and radical changes. I am going to vote for the motion which will be made to strike out the figures 18 and leave 19 as the minimum draft age. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is recognized.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say anything on this measure. The thoughts I shall present now are somewhat vaguely held in my mind, but it seems to me I have seen the cleavage in the discussion of this measure that is perfectly natural. I regret that the industrial centers of the United States seem to be strongly in favor of the 18-year enlistment, while the farm centers seem to be rather generally opposed to it. There is a reason for this. The reason exists in the fact that the exemptions allowed in the industrial centers are so much more numerous than those allowed in farming communities that our farms are being depleted, and the farm mothers and fathers feel that if you include their 18-year-old sons there is no chance of an exemption for anyone, not even in cases of families of five or six sons, as was illustrated in the case cited by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] a few moments ago, where a widow living on her own farm had been called on to give up five sons and had given them under the present law, and would be under this proposed law called on to give up her two remaining boys, and that, too, perhaps before many perfectly fit soldiers, but older ones, were taken, unless the so-called McKenzie amendment is adopted. The strong reason for adopting the selective draft was that under it we hoped to secure equality of burdens. I fear the adoption of this law without the McKenzie amendment is going to mean great inequality in many ways.

Now, do you know that there is an industrial problem on the farms as well as in the factory? In the transportation lines, in the mines, in the factories exemptions are allowed because of the necessity for carrying on the business for the maintenance of the war. But I have yet to find the first ordinary farm laborer who has been exempted on the ground that his industry is essential to carrying on the war. And so the farm father with five sons will lose them all. Fathers in industrial centers will have one son in this business and one in that business and one in the other, and some will be exempt and some will be taken and some will not. Not so with the farmer; none of his sons will be exempted unless they have already abandoned the farm.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will my friend yield there?

Mr. HARDY. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to say to my friend from Texas that I come from probably one of the greatest industrial centers in the United States, a city of 160,000 people, and that city has already furnished 10,000 men in this war.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman gives a splendid example; perhaps a great many of them are in different branches of volunteer service. And yet we have heard on this floor that there are sections of the country where class 1 embraces only 13 per cent of the population.

Mr. LANGLEY. And that is not true of the agricultural section.

Mr. HARDY. No; that is not true in farming districts. But in the agricultural populations you have 50 per cent nearer than 13 per cent of the lists in class 1.

Now, I have no interest in this matter. If you will pardon a personal allusion, I have but one son, who is 23 years old and married, with a wife and baby, who is serving his country in the Naval Aviation Corps. It is nothing to me personally, but all over my section of country I find that there is some tendency to complain that the farm laborer is not exempt, and as soon as we live to see the day of harvesting come around there will be a cry throughout the land for harvesters on the farm. There will be a cry in the Southland for cotton pickers in the fields.

Now, what I say is this is a controversy between the 18-year-old boy and the slacker. And I would like to say to our Secretary of War and to Gen. Crowder, under whom classifications have been made, why not go back and comb over your list, and in sections where you have only 13 per cent now placed in class 1, reclass them and put at least 40 per cent in class 1 before you go down and take the 18-year-old boy? For one, I think it has been demonstrated in this debate that the 18-year-old boy is not as well fitted for service as a man from 25 to 40. Go back to the slacker who is hiding behind business or who, while able to take care of wife and child, is hiding behind their skirts, and take those slackers, and then say to the great industrial sections of this country, "Before we will call for the boys, we will call for the slacker who is over 31." [Applause.] And "We will recomb the whole list."

I do not think it becomes the War Department to say that because they have administered this law in a slack manner and have allowed a great many to be placed in deferred classes that ought to be in class 1, they ought now to be permitted to take our 18-year-old boys in order to avoid the labor of reclassification and in order to expedite the gathering of men to go over yonder. We ought to recomb the lists rather than take boys of 18. I am willing to take the boys of 19, and I am willing to strike out the McKenzie amendment if you will place the ages from 19 to 45 and then take them as they come, old and young, and so avoid delay and trouble, but even then I think the lists ought to be reclassified and the slackers be combed out, however troublesome it might be. Let that be done as soon as possible. The cleavage that I spoke of in the beginning on this bill is apparent in this House, whether on the Republican or the Democratic side, and I speak for simple justice when I ask that other portions of the population of the United States shall bear their share of the burdens and not put it all on the farming class. I am willing to let the farming communities bear their share, and more than their share, but not out of all just proportion. I am speaking plainly.

I am speaking what has been in the minds of many on the floor, although they have not expressed the thought. I talk to you from Kansas and from Texas, and to you from the Southland and from the West, and you know that what I say is true. Let us go back and comb over the old lists, even if it takes a month or two, and let us not send our boys of 18 over at this time. Let this be a man's war, not a boy's war. We as men ought to conduct it with men. A 19-year-old boy is all right. But I tell you that when you send soldiers across the waters to the front against the biggest military machine and the strongest that the world ever saw and put that long bayonet in their hands they have need of a man's nerve; they have need of a man's weight behind it, to use it properly. You want sturdiness and nerve and calmness and precision of eye. You need a good heart and a good mind and you need all those together to fight the greatest army the world ever saw. I do not think you want to fill up our ranks with smaller boys.

It is arbitrary when you fix an age limit. You might just as well have said 17 years, and gentlemen could find in the gallery some physical specimen of a boy of 17 able to handle a musket.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. I shall not take up all that five minutes. But I want to say this, that so far as the policies of the War Department and of the administration are concerned, I stand here to uphold every effective measure. But I stand here also to exercise my judgment on every occasion. I do not believe that the President prefers young men to older men, but I think that because of the ease with which you can find the 18-year-old boy, without dependents and without family, it might be a little easier to bring him into the Army instead of going back and combing over the list of those men who have evaded the service.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. I think the gentleman is exactly right about that. But have you considered the fact that they have a record now in the 10,700,000 men who are registered? They have their questionnaires, their answers, and they can comb over that list. As the Secretary of War stated on the 13th of June, there was no necessity for enlarging the draft age then. Why can they not comb that list more easily than put in the boys?

Mr. HARDY. They can comb over that list more easily than they can put in the boys, and among the 11,000,000 between the ages of 31 and 45 it is inconceivable to me that only 600,000 could be obtained and taken out. Let us go to a little trouble; let our War Department go to a little trouble and ascertain who shall fight the battles of the country, and not permit any of the registration boards in connection with the questionnaires to hold only 13 per cent as liable to military service. I remember when we discussed this question before that two gentlemen from Nebraska from adjoining districts stated—or one of them made the statement, I think—that in a certain county in his district 70 per cent were placed in class 1, and in an adjoining county of the same kind of population less than 35 per cent were so classed. The administration of the law has been so slipshod that the list of registrants needs revising and combing over.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. What I would like to get at is this: The proposition is that we are right in the face of the enemy now. We need these men now. We have not time to punish somebody for making a mistake.

Mr. HARDY. It is not conceivable that we can take these boys right off the farm and dump them over there. We have to train them. Why can you not take the questionnaire of a man having $1,000,000 and claiming dependents—why can you not put him in there as quick as you can an 18-year-old boy? Why can you not reclassify the men whose names you already have as quickly as you can get the names and classify these 18-year old boys? [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. You can get them out of class 2 quickly, can you not?

Mr. HARDY. Yes; and when a man is worth $200,000 you can put him in there as quickly as you can put in the helpless boy whose mother takes care of herself. I have seen men who have families taken, and not a scrap of bread in their houses, and men whose wives were in the habit of working for a living. If anybody had dependents, they had.

This is not a rich man's or a poor man's war, and this Congress has done everything it could to prevent it from being. We have prevented any substitutes being hired, and Rockefeller and Morgan together can not buy a substitute. Yet we are told that in the administration of the law iniquities and inequalities can not be cured, but that we must go to the 18-year-old boy because we have not the time to comb over the list. In my opinion the time has come to comb over the list and put in those who ought to serve and not to take from him who has already given four boys the fifth and last one 18 years old while his neighbor of 40 years stays at home under some exemption of a business excuse. [Applause.] Gentlemen, it is a plain question to my mind of the 18-year-old boy against the slacker, and for one I am for the 18-year-old boy. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend I include with my remarks a letter I have just received, because it presents a very just and important viewpoint which I had not considered. The letter follows:

SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY,
Georgetown, Tex., August 20, 1918.

Hon. RUFUS HARDY, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am venturing to write you again concerning the proposed lowering of the draft age. In common with all other loyal citizens I am entirely committed to the cause of winning the war against autocracy and the brutal conception of life which now seems to be embodied in the governments and armies of Germany and her vassals. We must win at any cost.

But many thousands of Americans are seriously doubting whether the plan to put into immediate service our boys between the ages of 18 and 20 is not the costliest possible means of securing the victory for civilization. Among the men of this age there will, in the nature of the case, be the fewest possible exemptions. Indeed, only the physically or morally incapacitated will be exempt. Practically a clean sweep of able-bodied American youth between 18 and 21 years of age will be made. Of course, we hope and believe many of them will survive the war; but if it should continue for three or four years the very large majority of them will have been killed or maimed, and all of them will have been deprived of the opportunity for higher education. The lack of trained leadership among young men just after the war, the lack of heads of young families, of educated young men for the law, medicine, ministry, engineering professions, and the like, which this conscription of a whole class will lead to is appalling to think of. I understand that those engaged in essential occupations will be exempted. But does not this mean that the country will then be left without the guidance of the men of broader training and larger interests which we should otherwise have had, while the general political and social concerns of the Nation will be left to be determined by the clash of the various aims and ideas of those whose training has been limited to the experiences of a rather narrow group life. I am not an alarmist, but as a student for many years of our social life I look forward to the possibility of the elimination for three or four years of those who should be prepared for leadership in our civilization as the most expensive discounting of our future as a Nation which has yet been proposed.

Would it not be better to comb out of the classes already registered as many as 40 or 50 per cent of those immediately needed for service? Would it not be far better to provide that the youth of the ages mentioned should be given deferred classification, or a furlough status, with adequate arrangements made for training in college or otherwise for military service or work subsidiary thereto?

I do not speak of the ruin to our colleges which the proposed bill for lowering the draft will work—this ought to be given some consideration—but in complete loyalty I am begging your consideration of the needs of our country in the years after the war.

With the greatest respect, I am,
Cordially, yours, C. M. BISHOP, President.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the bill which we now have under consideration is one of great importance. It is important because the most solemn and serious responsibility which the Constitution confers on the Congress of the United States is the authority to deal with the man power of the Nation. There seems to be no difference of opinion that military necessity demands that the present age limits of the selective-draft law shall be extended. The question is, To what extent shall those changes be made? The Secretary of War and the Chief of the General Staff have recommended that the ages shall be fixed at from 18 to 45, inclusive.

I have read with careful interest their statements made to the Committee on Military Affairs during the hearings on this bill, and have also read with equal interest the copy of a study made by Provost Marshal Crowder relative to the different ages to be covered by the pending measure. In this study he gives a very interesting analysis of the man power covered by the proposed different ages. After a study of these I am not convinced that it is necessary at this time to draft boys 18 years of age into the military service of the United States. On the contrary, I am stronger than ever in my opinion that it should not be done. According to this study made by Provost Marshal Crowder, and which he submitted to the Military Affairs Committee for their information, and which the committee has in turn submitted to the House for the use of its Members, there will be 2,106,386 men register who are 19 and 20 years of age and there will be 10,028,973 who will register between the ages of 32 and 45, and this will make a total of 12,135,359 registrants who will be liable for military duty within the new ages if they are made 19 and 20 and 32 to 45.

These figures, of course, do not include any men who registered under the original act within the ages of 21 to 31, nor do they include any of the men who have registered since they became 21 under the amendment which Congress adopted several months ago.

In other words, the 12,135,359 registrants to which I have just referred would be an entirely new force to draw from. Of course, I realize that a very large number of these will be entitled to deferred classification on account of physical defects, on account of dependents, on account of being engaged in essential industries, and other grounds that are enumerated by the President in his rules and regulations for the enforcement and administration of the selective-draft law.

But I submit that with a uniform and fair enforcement of the draft regulations in all sections of the country that this total of 12,135,359 new registrants should yield considerably more than 2,000,000 men for active service, and that would be more than the program calls for for the nine months October, 1918, to June, 1919. Why do I say that this number of new registrants between the ages of 19 and 20 and 32 and 45 would yield more than the 2,000,000 men needed without the necessity of having to draft boys 18 years of age? On what do I base my assertion? Here it is: In the first registration of June 5, 1917, of those who were between the ages of 21 and 31 there were 9,586,508 who registered, and out of that number about 30 per cent have either been actually drafted into the Army, released for enlistment in the Navy and Marine Corps, or are still in class 1 subject for immediate call. Of course it is well known that most of these men have already been called and only a comparative few remain who are in class 1. So in studying the probable results of the pending bill we should bear in mind these facts and take them into consideration.

Now, it is undoubtedly true that so large a percentage will not be available between the ages of 32 and 45, but it is also equally true that the percentage of those within the ages of 19 and 20 will be much larger than 30 per cent; yes, as a matter of fact, will go beyond 50 per cent, according to the figures of the Provost Marshal General himself; therefore it may be assumed with absolute safety that the registrations of these ages 19 and 20 and 32 to 45 will yield at least 20 per cent of those who register as available for military service, and this, too, without the necessity of making the draft regulations for classification the least bit harder or more rigid than they are at present. This is a statement which is absolutely in accord with the facts and can not be successfully controverted. I would like to hear any man advance any good reason why he thinks the percentage of men available will be less than that which I have estimated. Now, on the estimate of Provost Marshal General Crowder that there will be 12,135,359 new registrants within the ages of 19 and 20 and 32 to 45 and estimating that 20 per cent will be placed in class 1 by the different draft boards, this would give more than 2,400,000 soldiers, which would be more than ample to meet the needs of the program of the War Department, to wit: Eighty divisions in France by June 30, 1919, and 18 divisions left at home in training.

Therefore there does not seem to me to be any pressing need to draft men who are only 18 years of age, and in my opinion only a pressing need would justify it. I think it will be generally conceded that France, England, and Germany did not draft their 18-year-old boys until the real need for it was urgent and pressing.

For this reason I expect to support the amendment which the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] says he will offer at the proper time, to strike out 18 years of age entirely from the bill and make the minimum 19, and I hope that the amendment will be adopted. But if it is not adopted, then I am going to vote for this McKenzie amendment, which proposes to divide the registrants into three groups, as follows: The first group composed of men 20 years of age and those between 32 and 45. Those who are placed in class 1 of this group will be called into active service prior to the succeeding groups.

The next, or second, group would be designated as the 19-year-old class and would be composed of those who are of the age of 19 and not over 20, and the amendment provides that this class shall be drafted subsequent to registrants in class 1 of the age of 20 and over that age.

The next, or third, group under this amendment now under discussion is the 18-year-old class, and the amendment as to that class reads as follows:

And registrants of the age of 18 years and not over 19 shall be designated the 18 class and shall be last called for service.

Indeed, I think they ought to be last called for service, and that is why I am going to vote for this amendment.

In the consideration of a subject of this importance it is well that we give some study to what other nations have done in this respect during this great war.

France has been in the war for more than four years, and, according to an editorial in the New York Sun of August 6, 1918, she did not call to the colors the 18-year-old availables belonging to the class of 1920, thus lowering by two years the regular draft-age limit, until the beginning of this month. By the terms of the recent treaty between the United States and Great Britain young men of British nationality may be drafted under the laws of the United States after they have reached the age of 20.

Thus we are now about to pass a law to draft our own boys of 18 and 19 years of age, and yet will be unable to draft those of our ally, Great Britain, who may be living here in the United States, until they reach the age of 20 years. If Great Britain did not deem it unwise to place young men under the age of 20 at the battle front, why did she stipulate the 20-year minimum age limit in her treaty? The question of how many men are necessary in the war is very properly a military matter, and as a Member of Congress I would not presume to question the judgment of the military authorities on that. The question of the movement of armies is also one which strictly belongs to them; but when it comes to a legislative determination of the draft ages and the order in which they may be called, that is positively a matter for Congress to determine, and we have no right to endeavor to shirk our duty and responsibility in such a grave question of Government policy.

During the discussion in the general debate yesterday and to-day a number of gentlemen have taken the position that because the War Department favors the unrestricted 18-to-45-year limit therefore Congress has nothing to do with the matter and should accept such recommendation without question. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], a member of the committee, correctly stated the question, I think, when he said that this is a matter entirely within the proper prerogative and responsibility of Congress; and although I did not agree with the views expressed by him as to the pending amendment, unquestionably he is right in his first statement. The Constitution of the United States places upon Congress the duty and responsibility of dealing with the man power of the Nation, and it is a responsibility and a duty that I as a Member of Congress have no disposition to evade. I have no desire to infringe on any of the prerogatives or duties of the War Department. I have no criticism of the Secretary of War. I am glad to praise the great services which he has rendered to our country in this trying hour of its history. I have no criticism of the Provost Marshal General, who is also performing his duty with marked credit to himself and to the country. But the responsibility in a matter of this kind is one which I can not and will not shirk. When gentlemen say that Congress should not pass any law placing registrants in certain groups and prescribing the order in which they shall be called, I want to call their attention to the military-service act of Canada passed in 1917. The Canadian Parliament wrote into their military-service law six different classes, and prescribed the order in which they should be called. I will not take the time to read all of these classes, but one class will illustrate to you the nature of all of the six classifications. The first class is this:

Class 1: Those who have attained the age of 20 years and were born not earlier than the year 1883 and are unmarried or are widowers but have no child.

That is to say, the Canadian Parliament wrote into their law that the first class shall be young men who have reached the age of 20 years and who have not gone beyond the age of 35, and who are unmarried or who are widowers with no children. That is the first class that they prescribe; and then in direct order the legislative body of the Dominion wrote five other classifications in their military-service law. Yet Members of Congress are criticized sometimes because we are willing to discharge our duty and responsibility in a matter of this kind. Why, gentlemen of the House, this war is not being fought by the President of the United States, wonderful and inspiring though his leadership may be. It is not being fought by the Secretary of War, brilliant though his ability may be. It is being fought by the people of the United States. And as their Representatives in Congress let us give thoughtful consideration to these great problems and courageous adherence to what we believe to be right. For, after all, the people are the ones who will be called upon to bear the heat and burden of the day and who must go through the fiery trials of sacrifice until peace comes once again to bless and comfort humanity. Just how long that will be we do not know, but this we know, that victory will be brought about by the spirit of America and her gallant allies—that spiritual temple which has been reared to the glory of God and the hope of the world on foundation stones that the sons of freedom of every race and creed have laid with sublime faith through the labor of a thousand years. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, it is undisputed in the record that there are within the United States 23,000,000 men within the ages of 18 and 45 years, of which number we have called already 2,000,000 men, leaving 21,000,000 subject to call, and out of which number we must get the required number under this draft provision now before the House. The question has been asked here repeatedly, and still remains unanswered, Why is it necessary to resort to boys 18 years of age when we have 21,000,000 men from which to select only 2,300,000 new soldiers, and the record further shows that there are only 670,000 of these boys? I watched the speech of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN], who has offered the amendment which will nullify the McKenzie amendment. I watched it carefully to find some reason why the McKenzie amendment should not be adopted, or why the Lunn amendment should be adopted, or some reason, when we have 21,000,000 men, why it is necessary to take 670,000 boys of 18 years of age to make an army at this juncture of the war. I find no reason, but I find a reason in the record of the hearings before his committee. The committee had hardly been organized for hearings before we found the gentleman from New York putting the Secretary of War on notice that the Thomas amendment which had been placed upon the Senate bill would require considerable discussion when it appeared on the floor of the House. In my judgment that is the reason. It is a question of labor organizations that have had so many men exempted of these 21,000,000 available men that it is claimed to be necessary to take 670,000 18-year-old boys from their homes. [Applause.]

I have lately come from my district, where, with an election staring me in the face, I looked into the eyes of my constituents and told them without a tremor that I was going to vote to give the President of the United States every dollar and every soldier he demanded, no matter how far down the line it cut; that if it took their 14-year-old boys I was going to vote to put them in; and they applauded me for it, and I stand ready to make that good.

It is simply a question as to when it becomes necessary; but when we can draft into the service of the United States the railroad corporations of the country, when we can draft into the service of the United States the telegraph and telephone lines, when we can take the money from the big corporations of the United States, when we can take everything, shall it be said that when we get to organized labor we have got to keep our hands off? On June 13, two months ago, the Secretary of War said that we would not have to take the boys, that we would not need any new draft legislation, but at the same time, in almost that same breath, he said that there would be another order immediately promulgated and put into effect by the War Department. That order was that the men of this country must work or they must fight. Ah! has this work-or-fight order made it necessary to use 18-year-old boys in the trenches? When he said that, we found Mr. Gompers coming in and saying, "You can not apply that 'work-or-fight order' to the labor organizations of this country." I told my people that when I came to Congress I was as good a friend as labor organizations ever had, but that since I had been in Congress a few months I had come to the conclusion that henceforth labor organizations must show me that they are right before I am going to vote for a single one of their demands.

As long as this war lasts I am going to vote to give the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, every dollar and every soldier and everything else he deems necessary and asks for to win this war quickly and successfully; but the President has not asked Congress to draft 18-year-old boys into the trenches, and until he does ask for it I feel at liberty to vote for the McKenzie amendment, which, while drafting the boys, requires them to be called last.

When my oldest boy reaches the age of 18 years he will voluntarily enter the service, and will not be affected by the proposed registration in September, but because he will be willing to serve voluntarily at 18, I do not feel that I have the moral right to force other boys 18 years old into battle until we first send the mature man power to the front or the President demands it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I told my people that when Mr. Gompers stepped in and told me that we could take everything in the world so long as we did not interfere with organized labor, that we could not withdraw an exemption whenever an exempted laborer refused to do some necessary work needed to win the war, that we could not do this and could not do that, I would tell Mr. Gompers to go to hell. [Laughter and applause.]

Under the Constitution of the United States we can not draft labor. I realize that. I will tell you something that we can do: When the laboring man, a member of organized labor, comes in and gets exemption by reason of an industrial enterprise in which he is engaged, if he refuses to work in that or some other essential enterprise, we can take that exemption away from him under the Constitution of the United States and make him fight when he refuses to work. That is exactly what I hope this Congress will do.

I am going to offer an amendment, such as the Senate amendment, to this bill, if it is not offered by older Members. I hope when the time comes that the manhood of Congress will stand up and tell organized labor that they are going to be just with them, but they are going to make organized labor stand up and justly take its medicine with every other citizen of the United States and either work or fight to win this war. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a request for unanimous consent. I understand that the chairman of the Committee of the Whole has a list of 14 Members who wish to speak further on this subject. Five minutes each would be a little more than an hour. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto close at half past 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto close at half past 4. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, I am unofficially advised that the chairman has a list of gentlemen who desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has, and the gentleman from Minnesota is on the list.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. "The gentleman from Minnesota" is not so much concerned as to whether his name is on the list as that several other gentlemen not on the list desire to be heard. Will this request, if granted, accommodate them?

Mr. DENT. By closing at 4.30 there is time for a number of others that are not on the list.

Mr. KAHN. Fourteen Members on the list and five minutes each will make 70 minutes. That would not consume all of the time between now and 4.30, and still leaves time for several gentlemen to speak under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman assume that none of those who wish to be heard will desire to occupy more than five minutes? Nearly every gentleman who has spoken thus far has had his time extended. Are those who remain to be confined to five minutes each?

Mr. KAHN. I was under the impression that the speeches made lately were only five-minute speeches.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question. Several members of the Committee on Military Affairs, anticipating the eagerness of Members of the House to discuss the question, have refrained from taking the floor and have waited until the membership had liberal opportunity in the discussion of the bill. Will there be some provision made whereby men who have given special study to the bill will have an opportunity to be heard?

Mr. DENT. I will say to my colleague that I have no disposition to cut off debate generally, and certainly not among the membership of the committee. I had supposed that members of the committee who wanted to discuss it had taken advantage of their privilege.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman from Alabama permit a suggestion?

Mr. DENT. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. In this section is all the disputed matter, so far as I know, in the entire bill. Instead of the gentleman making a request that the debate close on this amendment and all amendments thereto, why not say this section and all amendments thereto, which includes the whole provision, and then put it up as late as 6 o'clock? That will practically finish the discussion of the bill, and if you say section instead of amendment it will cover it.

Mr. DENT. I am willing to make that change in the request; change the word amendment to section, and make it 6 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close at 6 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. GORDON. Reserving the right to object, that would foreclose offering any amendment striking out 18 and inserting 19.

The CHAIRMAN. No; such an amendment would be in order.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, is that request predicated on the expectation that we will vote on the entire measure to-night?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Might I ask the gentleman, if the discussion runs as late as 6 o'clock, what particular haste there is at that late hour in disposing of the entire bill? Why can it not go over until to-morrow?

Mr. DENT. In answer to the gentleman I will say that having discussed the measure for two days I think the country ought to know exactly how the House feels on this subject at as early a date as possible.

Mr. FIELDS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, the bill, I think, should be passed to-day, but the House has not done much work for some time, and one man has as much right to the use of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD upon an important measure like this as another. I believe that we who have spoken can well afford, in a spirit of fairness, to remain until midnight, if necessary, for other men to speak who have not spoken. I want to be fair. I think the meanest monopoly is the monopoly of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in this body, and I hope that Members who want to speak on this measure may have an opportunity to do so. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] submits the following request, that all debate upon this section, section 1 of the bill, and all amendments thereto shall close at 6 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry. Is it to be understood that no votes are to be taken upon the amendments pending, and upon all other amendments pending at that time, until the hour of 6 o'clock arrives?

Mr. DENT. That is the understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. Providing debate runs that long.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, many of the Members of the House upon general debate had the opportunity to speak. Since we have been discussing the measure to-day Members have been recognized according to a list, as I understand it, maintained by the Chairman. The Chairman has a list of still some 14 Members who desire to be heard. I do not know how the list is made up or how it is arranged. Of course, if we speak by lists, some of the Members who are not anxious to slip around the desk and get their names on the list will get no recognition.

I do not believe we ought to fix a limit upon this debate until the list of 14 has been exhausted. When the Chairman has disposed of the 14, some of the other Members of the House possibly may like to be heard. If they do not, then it will be time to close debate. Under the circumstances, with a list of 14 still to be heard, I am constrained at this time to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to make a statement about the list. This list happens to come about in this fashion: Members have come to the desk and indicated that they desire to be recognized, and the Chair has put their names down in the order in which they came, and he has told each one that he would be recognized, the Chair always, of course, giving preference to members of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if this agreement should be made, then amendments offered in the meantime will lie upon the desk awaiting action?

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments can be offered before the vote is taken.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And Members will be recognized to offer amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I desire to offer an amendment inserting a new section after the present section. Can that be done?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; this agreement would not affect that.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California objects, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] is recognized.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon section 1 of this bill and all amendments thereto close at 6 o'clock.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri has been recognized for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that all debate upon section 1 of the bill and all amendments thereto close at 6 o'clock.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, because of the exhibit that was made here this afternoon by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] whereby he had four Marines in the gallery to show us what 18-year-old boys look like in uniform, I desire to pay a tribute to the Marines. They have been heralded throughout the world as the greatest organization of fighters in the world, and I think no one questions that for a moment. Immediately following this exposition of 18-year-old lads, I went in and called up the Marine Corps to find out the average age of Marines. I discovered from the personnel officer that the average age of first enlistments in the Marines is a few days under 24 years, and the average age of the members in the Marine Corps is 26. [Applause.] That is what that boy stuff amounts to. We have learned in the last 24 hours that the time when a man is at his best physically is when he is 18 years old. No one in the industrial world ever heard of that before. The wage system has never been arranged in that order. We have to reconstruct our ideas of manhood and put the 18-year-old boy where the heavy load is because he is so much superior to a man of 25 or 30! This talk has been ridiculous on the part of men who are trying to make us believe that these 18-year-old boys can endure more than a man from 20 to 40. There is not a man who is advocating the 18-year-old minimum who can name one single industry where 18 or 20 year old boys are recognized as being superior to the men of 30.

Mr. LITTLE. Or equal.

Mr. MEEKER. Or equal in any way, and yet because we men have had candor to say that boys of 18, regardless of what they did in the Civil War, should not be taken, we are criticized. It is no credit to the men of 35 of Civil War days that the boys had to do the fighting at that time. That was the best boy's army the world ever saw, but they would not have lasted long with a man's army. Let us remember this, as I said yesterday. Whatever success has come to the American Army in Europe now is due in very large degree to the fact that it is an army of men and not an army of boys. Boys are scattered here and there, where you can select a few athletes, physical giants at the age of 18, and they can go in the Marine Corps. Few men who have had anything to do with the Marine Corps but know that the boys of that corps of 18 and 19 are the pick of the United States, and that the average boy in that corps at that age is better than the average man at 30 or 40. It is not a fair comparison. The boy we had here in the first exhibit is possibly under weight, but that boy who was here comes more nearly being the average boy of 18 than the four boys you saw in the gallery; and at that, when you looked into the faces of those boys, it was plain to be seen that they are yet boys.

They have the boy countenance, they have the boy action. They are boys in mind and heart, and I say that the American Congress of men ought to be big enough to say to these boys who are called by the sound of the drum and the march of the parade, "You stay out until you are old enough."

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. TILSON. I asked the sergeant who was in charge of that squad of marines and he said that if he had his way he would have every one of that age, because they made the best soldiers. [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. They have not yet proven that on the battle field. I wish I could get hold of a statement of a great military leader in Europe who said not to send boys over there, but, regardless of that condition, gentlemen, I want to call attention to this: Is not it a pitiful spectacle that while little Scotland, with only 5,000,000 man population, all told, can keep her industries moving and put a million men at the front and not call her boys that the United States, with 25,000,000 of men, has got to call them in the first 15 months to get an army of 3,000,000?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Not now. While England and France have not only turned out their own stuff but are actually making the guns for our boys to use the fourth year of the war, England and France have kept their boys out, and here we are on the floor of the American Congress sending word to the enemy that we are so depleted in man power or so temperamentally cowardly or so awkward in administering the law that at the end of 14 months we put the boys in line.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Is it not a fact that the French nation, of not exceeding 40,000,000 of population, has raised 6,000,000 of men without calling in her 18-year-old men?

Mr. MEEKER. It is.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. And is it not a fact that the British Islands, with 45,000,000 population, have raised 6,000,000 men without calling in the 18-year-olds?

Mr. MEEKER. It is.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Then, is it not a shame that a country with 110,000,000 of population can not raise at least 4,500,000 without calling in their 18-year-old boys? [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Exactly.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. I would like to supplement the statement of the gentleman from New York by this statement, that France, after four years of war, has lost 33 per cent of her soldiers, and she has not yet found it necessary to call in her 18-year-old boys. [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Now, gentlemen, we might just as well be frank on this floor, because we passed this draft law. Somewhere there is something wrong in the calling of these men into service. I do not know where it is, but there was no man who voted for the draft law—and no man worked for it harder than I—who did not expect to see the men of class 2 called immediately after class 1, and nobody has yet been able to give any reason why they are not being called. I believe that the reason they are not being called is because of the purpose to create a shortage so that they can get the boys. The War Department last year wanted us to give them the boys of 18, 19, and 20, and if they hold back the class 2 men, married but with no children, then they will create a shortage that makes it absolutely necessary for us to put these boys in. We know what the consequence has been, and I say from the standpoint of efficiency of the Army I shall vote for the Johnson amendment to cut out the 18-year-old men altogether. From the standpoint of efficiency of the service we have no right to let these men stay at home, healthy and sound as they are, with not a chick or a child in the world dependent upon them, and put these boys in in their places. We do not need to make any bones about that. We know that the purpose of the War Department is to put more than half of these 18-year-old boys in the trenches inside of six months. What is the use of winking at it? It is not a responsibility upon the President, it is not a responsibility of the War Department, this Congress can not pass the buck to the President in this thing. It is up to us to determine what shall be the minimum age and we have got to stand up and assume that responsibility. If we make a blunder, it is our own. If we do the thing correctly, it is to our credit. Last year we put the minimum at 21. We got a man's army that has demonstrated what men can do and what they can endure, but we now propose, instead of taking the men of class 2—married men without children—who are just as well qualified to go as the men of class 1, and who should have been in the camps, instead of taking men of class 2, we shall not do so because somebody has blundered. We make the 18-year-old boys of this country pay the price for the blunder that has occurred somewhere in the War Department. Those men can begin to be called to-morrow, and it ill behooves any man to come on the floor of this House and confess a paucity of man power, at the end of 15 months of war, that requires the calling out of 18-year-old men or boys.

Now, gentlemen, as I said on yesterday I believe that this draft law should cover every citizen of America who is given the right of franchise. I am for universal military training of our boys from 18 to 20, and if it had not been for this same War Department we would have had a universal military training law more than a year ago. Now they propose the boys shall fill our camps. Where are they going to put the men? The whole program points, this whole legislation points, everything said in the hearings points, everything in the newspapers points to the one proposition, and that is that men in class 2, who were just as well qualified and ready to go as the men in class 1 that we permit to stay at home—the married men—and these boys of 18 and 19 shall take their places. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, war is the most strenuous business conceivable by the human mind. Modern warfare is an actuality beyond anything that was imagined up to the time that this war broke. War is so brutal as it is now carried on that the human mind naturally shirks from meeting its requirements, and most naturally a Member of Congress will hesitate to vote to send anyone into war of a tender age, especially against his will. That will account for the tremendous sentiment of this country against the reduction to 18 years when the proposition was first suggested. I think, as a man having spent all his life with young men, and naturally having a tender relationship toward them, that at this crisis we have all to consider as the major thought of the hour how to end this war in the shortest possible time and with the least possible loss. That is the business of the hour. I believe that sentiment has its place, and I hope I do not discount its importance, but it must not overcome judgment.

I am one of the Members of this House that will resent the suggestion that we should abdicate our prerogative here in legislation and give it over to any coordinate department. The membership of this House knows how I feel upon that, because of many utterances since I have been here. But when it comes to matters of diplomacy I always vote to give them over to the executive department, where they belong, and will insistently vote against this House interfering in that field. And when it comes to matters of the military I would not for a moment cast a vote to interfere in the slightest degree with what is the judgment of the men charged with the successful prosecution of this war when the matter at hand is military success.

I have perhaps been as close a student as one fairly could be of the movements at the front—I mean as one who is so far removed from the seat of war. I have tried to keep myself informed. I hesitate to criticize any military movement in Europe or in America, because I am not a military man and I must defer my judgment to those who are charged with the study of the strategy and held responsible for its prosecution. [Applause.] I therefore will not vote to interfere in the slightest degree with the efficiency, first, of the making of the Army, and, secondly, with the management of the Army in action. [Applause.] That is not my work. It is ours to arm the military agency with authority to do what is in its judgment necessary to win the war.

I voted, though somewhat reluctantly, to give to the President the power of commandeering, because I believed that was necessary in order to win the war. I voted to give over to the President the power to coordinate the various departments here in Washington and elsewhere when it looked almost like an abrogation of our power on this floor. And yet I did it because I thought it would materially aid the winning of the war. I voted that the President should have the power to control and operate the railroads, and I frankly say to you that I have always been opposed, and am now opposed, to Government ownership and operation of the railroads. I did not vote for it as a policy, but I voted for it as an emergency, in which I felt I had no choice. I voted the same way on the telegraph and the telephone. I voted to give over control of the press and a limitation on the freedom of speech. Why, fellow Members, if you take a catalogue of the legislation of this and the last Congress, you will see that we have been delegating to the Executive department, and through him to the military power, powers unnamed, and they make me shiver when I think of what would occur if they were inclined to abuse these powers. But we did it because never in the world has there been such a test. Never before, since the morning stars sang together, was the whole world on fire; all the populations of earth out of joint, straining every nerve to throttle each other.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. I was going to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he voted for the draft age of 19 to 25 before—the first draft law?

Mr. FESS. There is a criticism that belongs to this House and also to the country at large, and that is suggested by my friend from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] in his question, and I answer in this way: He asked whether I voted for the original bill that was recommended from the Senate, calling for 19 to 25 years. He will remember that the committee did not accept that amendment, and they reported it here at 21 to 40 years. I voted for that. And my criticism now upon that position is not unfriendly. It is this: That even to-day America, as a Nation, if, indeed, her Army may not have fully conceived the breadth and the depth of this awful war, does not know yet what it will require to meet it. And when the Secretary of War frequently states that we are months ahead of our plans he speaks the truth. But our trouble from the beginning—and I am perhaps as blameworthy as anyone—was that our plans have been behind instead of our being ahead of our plans.

This is a world war, and it comprehends beyond what any man two or four years ago conceived, and when we made our first law we did not make it sufficiently comprehensive, viewing the possibilities of this war as we view them to-day. And now, my friends, having voted over and over with a single purpose to end the war, although I think that my associations of the last 30 years would lead me to have as tender a relationship for the boys of 18, 19, and 20 as any man on the floor of the House, I will not vote to say to the War Department that "if, in your judgment, it is necessary to win the war that you call the 18 and 19 year old boys, you shall not do it until you call the others." [Applause.] And that is all this amendment says. This amendment voted down will probably lead the War Department to do what the amendment proposes to do. But if you vote it in you hamstring the Military Department, and it can not do what ought to be done, provided in the future it is revealed it ought to be done. That is the reason I refuse to hamstring the Military Department.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Has the gentleman such supreme regard for the opinion of the War Department and such unbounded willingness to take its advice that he would vote for 14 or 15 year old boys in the war if they would advise it?

Mr. FESS. If the 16-year-old boys were called because the others had gone, and we needed them, and the War Department would say to me it was essential, I certainly would vote to call them in rather than to surrender. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GORDON. You would not call the 16-year-old boy until the 18-year-old boy is called? There are 20,000,000 men in this country who have not been called. Why do you now say you would call in the 18-year-old boy?

Mr. FESS. In answer to my friend, who is one of the most courageous and, I frankly say, one of the most efficient Members on the floor of this House—although he and I frequently have not agreed—in answer to him I want to make this observation: Over and over again the statement is made that 6,000,000 men have been drawn in France from a population of 40,000,000, and a similar figure from Great Britain from a population of 46,000,000. If we are willing to make the fight—to pay the price—that France has made, then we could safely pursue the suggestion of my friend from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. If you should walk through any part of France outside of the war area, you would not see a man anywhere. They are at the front. You will not see them even in the industries. Their women are there, and the manhood of France is robbed and is being put to the death in this terrific battle of life and death. If we are willing to take the women out of the homes and put them in the industries, then we can take the men out of the industries and send them instead of sending the boys who are not in any particular industry.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. FESS. In just a moment. My point is this, and I hope I can state it without any ambiguity: Classes 2, 3, and 4 are a recognition of the fact that this whole Nation is in the war, and as one class is fighting other classes are working. That is the very genius of the selective-draft system. It is that purpose which caused its adoption. I believe thoroughly, I will say to my friend, in making operative the "work-or-fight" order, so that every man at home will either work or fight, I do not care which, provided it is done by the authority of the Government. I will vote to increase the age to 50, in order to make operative that rule.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. In a moment. I do not want to be misunderstood. I think that the War Department, in not taking the upper classes, is acting on the basis that it will be more efficient in the winning of the war to leave them at home to work here, and not because they want to exempt them because there is any influence. If there is anything of that, I denounce it as a most ungodly performance. In certain quarters in individual cases such charge has been made. But that does not condemn the principle upon which we now are acting. But I think the War Department is trying to work out the population of America in such a way as to win the war in the most speedy fashion at least cost of treasure, and I will not interfere with their suggestion if they say, "We can drill an army of 18, 19, and 20 year old boys more quickly than we can make soldiers out of older men." And I can say, as one who has had 30 years experience with boys, that while my friend from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] would be one of the last men in the world that I would want to meet in a physical contest, yet it is no disrespect to him to say that in a bayonet action I would rather face him than a 19-year-old trained boy. [Laughter.] Such a boy would play "cards and spades" with him, because the boy is quicker and his muscles are more easily coordinated. My son learned to ride a bicycle in five minutes, while it took me a week to do it. That shows the advantage of trained coordination of the muscles and quickness in receiving instruction. Boys of 18, 19, and 20 make trained soldiers much more quickly than do older men.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that he wants to follow the recommendations of the War Department. In a letter addressed to the Chief of Staff by the Provost Marshal General on July 27 he states:

> Pursuant to your memorandum of July 24, transmitting a copy (secret) of the approved military program for 1918–19, and calling for the draft of a proposed bill lowering the draft age to 19 and raising it to 40, I transmit herewith estimates of the effectives obtainable by the enlargement of the draft ages, in the shape of three studies covering age groups 32–40 combined with 19–20, 32–45 combined with 19–20, and 32–45 combined with 18–20, and showing the estimated effectives for each combination.

It seems that after very mature consideration they made the minimum age 19 and the maximum 40. When did the War College revise that statement?

Mr. FESS. What date was that?

Mr. ALEXANDER. July 27, 1918.

Mr. FESS. July 27 was just 12 days after the fifth German drive opened and nine days before the French, British, and American armies made their counter drive upon the enemy, which is still on. I want to say to my friend from Missouri—and I want him to listen—that in a contest where 4,000,000 men on one side stand in deadly struggle with 4,000,000 men on the other side a change of conditions requiring a change of policy can take place over night. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. But I wish to say to the gentleman that there is no change of conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks to proceed for one minute more. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Make it three minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be given three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may proceed for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Then I will have to yield to my friend from Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio this question: The gentleman has referred to the fact that in France the women have been compelled to enter the industries, which is true. Under the present condition of affairs in this country, if you take out the boys of 18, 19, and 20, that is precisely what we will have to do with the women in the farming district which I have the honor to represent. They are already compelled to go into industries in considerable measure. If you take away the supply of 18, 19, and 20 year old boys, you will force the women into the industries still more. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. In reply to my friend from Virginia, I want to emphasize the fact that this, in my judgment, has been one of the best debates, all day yesterday and to-day, that I have had the pleasure of listening to. The questions are sincere and honest and there are honest differences of opinion. I want to say to my friend from Virginia that he is going on the assumption that when we call 18-year-old boys, or give the power to the President to call the boys of 18, 19, and 20, they will be called, whether it destroys agriculture or whether it will destroy other industries or not. That is an assumption that is false.

If we write into law what he wants, then we forbid the War Department doing what seems to them to be necessary. If we leave that out, it gives the War Department the power to do everything they deem essential to win the war. I live in an agricultural section. My constituency in the main are farmers. It is the most necessary of all occupations, and they demand labor. I vote for this measure in the belief that the War Department will recognize the need of that industry, because it is essential for their purpose. If they do not, it is not my fault. I do not propose to vote for any particular interest, like the farmer or like the industries, to the detriment of the larger values. I propose to vote for the interest of America in the greatest world war that ever took place. [Applause.] And I take it that the War Department will administer the law so as to effect the least evil and to guarantee the greatest good, and that is the reason I will vote against the McKenzie amendment.

Mr. GOOD and Mr. SEARS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. I call my friend's attention to one case where he did not follow the War Department since this war began, and that was in a case where just as technical and scientific knowledge was essential as in this. Last December, when the Secretary of War made his estimate under the law for field artillery and field-artillery ammunition, he asked for $3,332,000,000. Within four months he increased that to $9,000,000,000, and it was up to the Appropriations Committee to decide whether it would blindly follow the request of the War Department in this respect and place on the American people a burden of more than $4,000,000,000 to be borne in taxation. The Appropriations Committee accepted the challenge and brought in a bill reducing that estimate from $9,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000, and yet we have given the Secretary of War every penny he can use, and the gentleman voted for that action.

Mr. FESS. I voted for it because there is an opportunity, in case the appropriation allowed is not enough, to vote for an additional amount, which the gentleman would vote for if it were recommended, and that without the slightest delay.

Mr. GOOD. Absolutely.

Mr. FESS. But in raising an army time is the element, and we can not now fritter away that time when our men are needed just at present, in the awful stress of war, when men are the one great essential. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Time is the element; but they do not propose to call the 18-year-old boy for almost a year, according to their own statement.

Mr. FESS. Let me say to my friend that Germany has ceased to be on the offensive. She is now on the defensive, and time becomes the essence to prevent her digging in and operating under a terribly dangerous fortified method of defensive. We must pursue her, give her no rest, and constantly augment our forces until we compel a decision. It is humanity to give the President the biggest army in the quickest way to get the best results, and not fritter away the time. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. If time is the essence, then why not call the men in class 2 at once?

Mr. FESS. The contention to call the other classes is but an objection to the administration of the selective-draft law and does not go to the essence of the issue now at hand. The other classes can be called at any time under the present law. But we must give the power to the Army and Navy to utilize the entire resources of the country in the best possible way to produce best results. I shall vote for the measure as recommended by the War Department, which still permits it do what the McKenzie amendment requires, provided in the judgment of those charged with the responsibility of success on the field it is best to do so, and in case their judgment does not so decree they need not be so held, and ought not to be, in my judgment. I will therefore vote against this amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to follow my able and eloquent colleague from Ohio [Mr. FESS], with whose sentiments I entirely agree, and I shall merely say one word in supplement to what he has so well said.

It has become increasingly evident from the beginning of this debate that the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and the high command of the Army are definitely and strongly opposed to the McKenzie amendment or to any amendment of that nature. It has become entirely apparent that the men responsible for the conduct of this war, the men charged with carrying out the provisions of this bill, regard the McKenzie amendment and like amendments as serious obstacles in the direction of building up the most powerful and effective Army that can be built up.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask not to be interrupted, because I shall not ask for any more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to be interrupted.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How, then, can I hesitate as a Member of this House in the determination of which way my duty lies? Like my colleague from Ohio [Mr. FESS], if I consulted my own feelings alone I would be loath on my own motion to advocate the drafting of boys of 18 years of age. If I relied on my own opinion simply I would think that the time had not yet arrived when it had become absolutely necessary to draft boys of 18, but the high command tells us that the time has arrived and the necessity is here. Shall I then give more weight to my opinion, inexpert and immature as it is, than to the opinion of the high command of the American Army, mature and expert as it is? For one I have no hesitation as to what I shall do in this emergency.

Gentlemen, I have been taught to fear the Greeks bearing gifts. In this instance I find that the gentlemen who offer this amendment to the House in the main to be those who were opposed to war and who were opposed to the first conscription act. I do not for a moment impugn the loyalty of these gentlemen, least of all that of the author of this amendment [Mr. MCKENZIE] than whom there is no more loyal and patriotic legislator in either House of Congress. I simply question their judgment, and I repeat that in the main they represent that sentiment in this House which has run counter to the war program of this administration from the outset. Therefore, when I know that the Commander in Chief of the Army urges this as a war necessity I feel no hesitation in following him. I find also that the President of the United States has once again been compelled to turn away from the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee and from the majority members of his party and turn to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to find an advocate for his side of the case. I am glad now, as I have been in the past, to follow the leadership of the gentleman from California. [Applause.] The gentleman from Alabama, chairman of the committee, is a strenuous opponent of universal military training and as such supports the amendment. If the elimination of it is a step in the direction of universal military training, and I believe it is, then that of itself is a potent argument for the restoration of the bill to its original form. I repeat that when the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, his Secretary of War, and the high command of the Army to a man, say that the passage of this measure without amendment is a necessity in the creation of a more powerful and effective instrument for the winning of the war, their advice should be followed and not the advice of those who rely on their own personal opinions. In this as in all war measures from the beginning I shall stand by the President of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I see that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] desires recognition. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I can follow the gentleman.

Mr. SMALL. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for five minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, to me this has been a very interesting debate. Frankly, when I entered the hall this morning if I had been called upon to vote I should have voted for the McKenzie amendment. I want, however, as my eyesight is not as good as it used to be, to ask the Clerk to read as a part of my remarks the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

During the day Secretary Baker issued a statement about the policy of the department regarding men under 20, in which he said it is intended to call them last.

"I hoped that Congress would not make the law so inelastic as to make it impossible for us to call the 18 and 19 men until we could certify definitely that we had exhausted the other ages," said Secretary Baker, "because the long drawn-out processes of classifying and deferring men may take so long that we never can tell when we have absolutely finished with the other ages."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this statement that has just been read, I think, corresponds with the statement made substantially before the Committee on Military Affairs. It is in this morning's Post, and I presume is reliable. I am not going to accuse any man, a Member of this House, of unworthy motives, and I will not allow any man to accuse me of unworthy motives without resenting the accusation. I am glad to believe, and do believe, that upon this side of the House we stand, following our best judgment, to support the administration and the war. [Applause.] I think the same is substantially true upon that side of the House. I did not vote for President Wilson. I did all I could by vote and speech to elect Mr. Hughes, but the people by a constitutional majority chose Mr. Wilson President. Great Britain and France and Italy have changed their Government three or four times since this war commenced. We can not change our Government if we desired to do so for substantially two years and a half. We have got to go under the leadership of our President, Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, to heaven or hell, or a long way toward one or the other, before his administration expires. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, as he is responsible, as we are all responsible for legislation and in legislation that requires the two-thirds vote to overrule his veto if he did not approve of it, the thing for Congress to do in perfect good faith is in money, in men, in arms and munitions, to give him full and entire support. [Applause.]

Oh, we have got our hands full, gentlemen. It is almost an irresistible force meeting an immovable body in Europe. We have the bolsheviki and the Germans on the eastern front, not under our dominion, and yet under the providence of God, with his blessing, I trust, whatever the cost, we will win. I made up my mind when under the direction of the Kaiser on the world's highway they destroyed our ships and killed our citizens that we had better, one and all, go to any extent to put him and the spirit which he has exhibited to the bad.

Now, that is all I have got to say. I have been frank with the House and always try to be frank with it. But you say, Why do not you go into class 2 for military service? I think they will, and into class 3, I hope, and also class 4. If anybody cheats in going to these various classes, he loses his own self-respect, and in the fullness of time the American people will punish him. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, this debate revolves around the proposition to reduce the liability for military service from the ages of 21 to 18. I think there has not been presented to me as a member of this body a proposition which has been more perplexing or embarrassing than has this. I wish to discharge my duty, just as I assume every Member of the House desires to do, and the dominant query in my mind in the consideration of this bill is, Where does that duty lie?

The war administration tells us that in order to end this war quickly and win a decisive and complete victory we must have in France next spring 80 divisions, or 3,200,000 men, or thereabouts; that we must have in training in the United States at least 18 divisions, or about 750,000 men. They say that after the most mature deliberation it is impossible to secure that many effective men under the present selective law without extending the ages from 18 to 45.

It has been repeated so often in this debate that it is surplusage to do so again, that the men who are responsible for the prosecution of this war to its conclusion are entitled to the respectful consideration and support of the Congress.

What is our duty in voting upon this question? We have entered upon this great war with the supreme purpose to prosecute it to a successful issue. The Member from Illinois who offers the McKenzie amendment and every gentleman who has spoken will candidly and truthfully and sincerely admit that he has no other purpose than to win a victory in this great war. Is it necessary in order to achieve a victory to extend the ages under the selective-draft law?

In answering that question it will not do to point to the young men of 18 years old as boys, as robbing the schools and the colleges, because of the very small percentage compared with the total number in the high schools and colleges at the age of 18. If it is fair to take the great bulk of those at that age who are not in a high school or college, certainly there should be no discrimination against those who are. If I read military history correctly, the boy of 18 is a military unit that is effective, he is one that has achieved glory for our country and for other nations. The boy of 18 who is selected for military service, let us assume, will be physically fit, not like the young men paraded before us by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], but like those representatives of the Marine Corps who stood up before us in the gallery. It will not do, as gentlemen have done, to make the query, "Why not get men to make up this deficiency?" Where will they be obtained under the present selective-draft law? Gentlemen point with assurance to the number of industrial slackers, as they are called, and say, "Why not put them into the service?" Are there slackers? Are there men between the ages of 21 and 31 who ought to be in the military service? Then whose fault is it, I ask? We passed the law. The War Department made regulations consistent with that law. Have there been criticisms of those regulations? Who administers the selective law under the present ages and under the regulations imposed by the War Department? The men of the vicinage, the men of the counties, the men who are familiar personally with the local conditions in their counties.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. So that if there have been errors in the administration of the selective-draft law, it lies with the local and district draft boards of the respective States. When gentlemen say go into the deferred classes under the present law and comb them out and get the men in order to make up this deficiency, they owe it to the House to point out the methods by which it might be done.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I have very little time, but I yield for a question.

Mr. GORDON. I can tell you where you can get 500,000 of them, and that is in class 2 of married men without dependents.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman is making a general statement.

Mr. GORDON. It is true.

Mr. SMALL. Has the gentleman in his own city of Cleveland complained against the administration of the draft law? Has he ever, before this bill was under consideration, uttered one word of criticism—and I take it there are just as many of that class in his own city of Cleveland as there are in any county in my district in North Carolina. You can not make general statements in respect to a matter affecting vitally the prosecution of this war without going into details and proposing a proper remedy. In the administration of this law we thought and we realized that it was necessary to dedicate to the prosecution of the war all of the resources of our people that were needed, not only man power upon the front but in the industrial plants of the country and upon the farms.

Let it be remembered that all these men in deferred classes have been exempted for physical reasons or industrial reasons or because of dependent families, and when gentlemen talk about men in these deferred classes who ought to be put into active military service, I say to them that in making any such statement they are criticizing and condemning the administration of the law by the local and district boards in the several States of the Union.

My personal predilection is against taking the boy of 18. The governor of my State has written a strong letter to each member of my State delegation urging that they be not included. I have had letters from mothers and fathers in my district; but, after all, the vital question which must arise in the mind of every conscientious American and of every Member of this House is, What is his duty in the prosecution and in the achievement of a great victory in this war? I do not put into the keeping of any man, not even into the hands of my constituency, my solemn duty to my country and to the flag. Wherever that duty be, whether it involves the sacrifice of the position which I hold, I shall follow the path which is necessary in the discharge of it and in the achievement of a victory in this titanic contest. Yet, to be perfectly frank, while I am opposed to the McKenzie amendment, and I shall vote against it, when the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], reducing the minimum age from 18 to 19, comes up before the committee, I shall vote for that, because under that we shall be able to get, according to the figures that have been submitted, 1,722,000 men, leaving only about five or six hundred thousand men of a deficiency in the number of effectives which are said to be required.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Then let the gentlemen who talk about effective man power, about combing deferred classes and getting the men to fill the deficiency, point out some method, if you please, by which we can obtain these four or five or six hundred thousand men. But if that amendment making the minimum age 19 instead of 18 shall not prevail and the question is squarely presented to me whether I shall set up my judgment upon this bill as an entirety against the men who are at the head of the war administration, whose solemn duty it is to bring success to our Army, whose training and capacity and patriotism entitle them to consideration, I shall not attempt to set up my judgment against theirs, but in the last analysis I shall vote for the bill just as they have presented it to Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I regretted exceedingly in committee to differ from my colleague [Mr. MCKENZIE], who introduced this amendment, because we have gone hand in hand together on so much important legislation affecting the war.

But I approached that amendment as I would a railroad crossing where the signboard says or reads, "Stop, look, and listen!" and I scented the danger, and the train went by with MCKENZIE at the wheel, some good men in his crew, some strong men, our able chairman, the ranking Member, Republicans and Democrats, and I respect them all. I liken myself, as a layman on the committee, to the position I occupied when I was learning my trade as a wool merchant in the city of Lawrence, Mass., when I went there to learn the wool business, and to take up a fleece of wool and sort the fine from the coarse, and so forth, and I felt that in serving my apprenticeship I was accepting instruction from my bosses; and so the recommendations of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, and the Provost Marshal General, who has carried out so beautifully the draft system within the past year, can not be ignored in this important legislation.

I deplore the fact that we have got to go below the age of 21 to take boys into the Army, but from testimony revealed it is the intention and purpose of the War Department to comb out the men between 31 and 46, of which there are 600,000 in number, and then gradually take the men of 21, 20, 19, and 18, and in that order, and in the meantime those men who have become of age since August this year. I look upon this war as a great big business proposition, and the fact that we have deferred classifications of 2, 3, 4, and 5 is evidence of sound business foresight. When we went into the war a little over a year ago Italy was bankrupt, France was bleeding to death, and England was tired out, and we arrived in the nick of time, and these different classifications are fixed as they are so that we can carry on this Government as a great business proposition, elastic and comprehensive. Classes 2, 3, and 4 are working, too, for the interests of the war, and the exemption boards have the power to pull men out of classes 2, 3, and 4 and reclassify and place them in class 1; and I know many instances where that has been done. When I saw those four Marines arise in the gallery it was an inspiring sight. I think this Congress ought to know a piece of news that has come to me, because I have never seen it in any newspaper dispatch—that 10,000 of those Marines, many of them between the ages of 18 and 21, in the last great German offensive a month or so ago—and I got this in confidential letters, but believe this news should be given to the world—10,000 American Marines, flanked by four American regiments, saved Paris, and they did so at the beginning of the last offensive on the retreat of the allies, who advised the retreat of the Americans; but the Americans said, "We have been advised to stick here," and they held continuously for 30 hours; and some day this will filter out through the press that these 25,000 Americans saved Paris. [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLNEY. I will.

Mr. MEEKER. Can the gentleman explain mathematically how a majority could be under 19 when the average age——

Mr. OLNEY. I did not say a majority; I said many Marines.

Mr. MEEKER. When the average age is 24 of the first enlistment, and I did not see how it could get——

Mr. OLNEY. I said many Marines.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLNEY. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We hear a great deal about the law of averages and percentages here, and we used to learn in common-school arithmetic that in order to make fair comparisons we must start from a common base. Now, if you are undertaking to show what the law of average in age may be by starting at 18 and on to 45, it takes a great many 18, 19, and 20 men to offset one man coming in at 45 years, and that so-called average does not show how many men of 18, 19, and 20——

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. What right has the gentleman to assume 18 as a base; why not take 26?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am not stating the base; I am talking about what is the meaning of the so-called average age in an organization that takes men in between 18 and 45, and if anybody goes to the common-school arithmetic he will see that we must have a great many men of 18 to offset the one man of 45 in order to keep an average age down in the twenties.

Mr. OLNEY. Much has been said here about deferred classifications in this country. It was made possible and was advised by the best brains of Europe, in order that we might supply the nations of the earth with necessary products; and we kept the allied nations alive before the war, and ever since then our agricultural and business interests have been busy in furnishing materials and supplies not only to the allied nations but those neutral nations deserving help.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLNEY. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Is it not true we get a large part of our artillery even yet from France?

Mr. OLNEY. The heavy artillery, to some extent.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. If France can supply our own armies and hers, too, with equipment and still keep out these boys of 18, would it not be a fair proposition for us to follow their example?

Mr. OLNEY. No; to my mind it is a small equation—the artillery she is furnishing America. Italy has no deferred classification, nor has France, nor even England, except as to agriculture and industry, and those nations, having a great man power in the war in the early days of the war, would be reduced, naturally, to 18-year-old men. We have arrived in France morally and physically with a million and a half men; and yet it must be reckoned that only 60 per cent of our forces abroad are fighting men, and it takes about one man to take care of another man, considering our chain of boats going across the sea transporting troops. Therefore we need every bit of man power that the War Department asks for; and, furthermore, I am proud to say that our Army is the cleanest morally in the world as well as physically and mentally fit.

And we have arrived at a determination to win by the courage born of the American soldier licked into a living flame with our enthusiasm to crush Prussianism which will cause America to rewrite in blood if necessary the Constitution of the Old World central powers. And I urge every Member—from Massachusetts as well as from Alabama—to vote to support the administration. I wish to say, if this word can lend you any encouragement, that a Cabinet officer told me yesterday afternoon, as the spokesman of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, that the President is very much in favor of the original program of the War Department and does not want any such monkey wrench as the McKenzie amendment thrown into the machinery. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLNEY. The following letter from a prominent official of the American Red Cross Association is self-explanatory, but in further explanation it should be stated that the recruits who arrive in camps and cantonments afflicted with venereal diseases are immediately segregated, given the best medical attention and treatment, and are not released for military service until completely cured. The Army camps as schools of discipline and careful attention and guardianship are the best asylums for the boys, and the American Red Cross Association is doing a noble, splendid work in protecting the morals of the soldier as well as in providing segregation and medical treatment:

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS OF THE AMERICAN RED CROSS,
Washington, D. C., August 22, 1918.

Hon. RICHARD OLNEY,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. OLNEY: For your information I quote the following from the Official United States Bulletin, under date of August 17, 1918. The War Department authorizes the following:

"There is a sharp increase in the number of cases of venereal disease in the divisional camps and cantonments, 5,507 being reported, as compared with 3,760 for the previous week. This increase is due to the large number of new men recently inducted into service. Among colored registrants something over 30 per cent and among whites about 8 per cent are venereally infected when brought into camp."

Further, from May 24 to August 2, one week estimated, shows that 44,723 men came into our new Army, bringing with them from civil life syphilis or gonorrhea. This shows a rate of 20,000 a month or 240,000 a year, equal to over seven divisions laid low before getting into the fight.

Very truly, yours,

GRAHAM F. BLANDY,
Assistant Director Bureau of Sanitary Service.

P. S.—The above cases of diseases were contracted before the recruits entered the cantonments.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, it had been my purpose to offer an amendment to the pending section to make the draft age of the new draft from 21 to 45 years, inclusive. I am opposed to the proposition of drafting at the present time men under 21 years of age, but I am informed that my colleague from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] will offer an amendment to that effect. Therefore I will withhold my amendment. I do not care, Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances to attempt to take up the time of the House or to make an argument. It would be impossible to do so creditably within the five-minute limit. I therefore ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont, a member of the committee, asks recognition for five minutes. The gentleman is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, everybody realizes at this stage of the proceedings that it is not likely that any new argument will be advanced; nor is it very probable that men who have given serious consideration so long to such a serious problem will be disturbed in their convictions already arrived at, by rhetoric, sentimentality, beautiful appeals to the flag, allusions to the boys dying in the trenches, and all that kind of thing. There is not a man in the House who does not at the proper time feel his spirit stirred by all the emotions that such literary phrasing is intended to express, but when we sit here as lawmakers, trying to organize an army to fight a war, it seems to me our safest resort is to the cold, hard business proposition of simple logic and a few elementary principles. And by such cold reasoning and unemotionalism only, I may add, we may hope best to aid those brave soldiers of ours to win this war.

I will say at once that I am opposed to the McKenzie amendment. I am opposed to it, no matter how it is refined, no matter how it is explained, because, notwithstanding the good faith of my respected colleague, Mr. MCKENZIE, of Illinois, in the introduction of this amendment, it is a limitation upon the power of the Government to raise an army of sufficient size and put it into this contest at the hour and moment it may be most needed. Any limitation is a limitation, it does not matter how nicely and deftly you juggle the words or how beautifully you try to spin delicate and tempting refinements of the meanings of words. A limitation is a limitation.

Now, it is a singular thing to me that after all these years and all the experience this country has had with wars and armies we wake up now, apparently for the first time in our history, to be sensitively and fearfully aware of the fact that liability to military service in the United States begins at the age of 18 years. I have only to refresh your memories of the days when you were schoolboys and when, gradually getting older and more mature and taking notice of the bigger things in the bigger world outside, you were one day challenged by some fellow schoolboy with the suggestion that "One of these days they will put you into the Army"—a little bit of foolishness that schoolboys indulge in sometimes—and you had grown up, as every other American youth grew up, to know and to make the answer, "They can not put me into the Army until I am 18 years old." Every schoolboy knew it. And every father and mother knew it. Practically every war that ever came upon this country after we had organized ourselves as a Nation found that law on the statute books. My own State of Vermont has had it in her law for I do not know how long, and it long has been a familiar statute all over the country. You and I, any time before the alarm of this present war was upon us, answering the question of a foreigner or a stranger as to what our ages for liability to military service were, would answer offhand, "Eighteen to forty-five." We did not think there was anything wrong about it. Yet now, when we are actually trying to put such a principle, long acknowledged in law, into actual realization in a war that calls for men, we suddenly awake to find the proposition is imbued with a tremendous amount of pathos and sentiment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And then we begin to talk about robbing the cradle and all that kind of thing.

There is another strange thing that goes right along beside that. All this time prior to the war, or even since the war began, so far as our participation in it is concerned, we have permitted young men at the age of 18 voluntarily to enlist in the Army of the United States. They have done it for years. For a long time it was necessary that they should have the consent of their parents or guardians in order to enlist at the age of 18, but recently that has been changed, and it is now held that a boy who enlists of his own accord in the Army of the United States at the age of 18 years can not be released from his military obligation by the protest or application of a parent or a guardian. It is held that he is of sufficient age and matured judgment to permit him to make his voluntary choice as to whether he will serve in the Army or not. We have all assented to that as a matter of fact. Nobody has ever seemed to raise any objection to it. It went along and worked itself out automatically.

Now, then, if to-day we, the elders, are talking about the immaturity of boys of 18 and debating a refusal to compel them to go into the Army at 18 because we hold ourselves nationally as sponsors for their welfare and as their guardians, how does it happen that we have gone on up to this precious moment not exercising this guardianship, founded on the idea that they were too immature to take care of themselves, and how could we have permitted them all these years, on their own judgment, to enlist in the military service at that tender age and refused to let them out if they did? Fathers and mothers were just as solicitous for their boys in years past as they are to-day. But they did not protest and get this law changed. How many do you think, if the truth were known, are actually protesting to-day?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will if I have the time.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Everybody on the floor admits that they ought to go in. Some or most of the Members have said that they should go in at even 16 or 17 if necessity demanded. The question is whether they should be put in while older men remain at home.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That question is not presently before us. This bill cites the years at which they shall go in. That is what we are arguing about. Men have in all good faith and sincerity undertaken to tell us that a boy of 18 years of age is not of sufficient physical maturity or of sufficient mental dependability to go in and be a good soldier. If that is true, why is it that through the century and a half, nearly, of our national experience the Army itself, in peace times as well as in war, has of its own accord, as a result of its own experience and observation through a century and a half of peace time and war, fixed 18 as the first age when it was thought a man was beginning to be fit to be a soldier and fight in wars?

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Can the gentleman explain why the minimum draft age in the Civil War was 20 years?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not know; and perhaps that is as good an explanation as anybody else could give under the same circumstances. But I will call the attention of the gentleman to another fact, and that is that the conditions under which the Civil War was fought did not make the urgent demands on the labor and other interests at home to the support of the Army in the field that this present war does. [Applause.]

Mr. SANFORD. And in that war drafted men were allowed to hire substitutes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes. It has been suggested by my friend from New York [Mr. SANFORD] that in that war men could buy substitutes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman from Vermont is a member of the committee. Personally, I would like to have it explained just how the adoption of the McKenzie amendment would produce delay in the recruiting of a sufficient army to do what the War Department desires to do.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. My friend from Michigan there gets down, it seems to me, to just the point that disturbs the minds of a good many men here. Words written into a statute may or may not——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has again expired.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I say, words in a statute which seek in any sense to limit the order of time in which an army can be raised or employed have just this effect, that if the events afterwards do not invoke that restrictive clause there has been no restriction, but if the events do invoke it the result is delay. If there is in the minds of any men the possibility that nothing will arise to make this provision effective and thus delay the raising of an army, and that, therefore, it is safe to put in the language, I want to say that it is far and away safer to leave it out altogether.

No man can condense in 10 minutes what we have all been thinking about for weeks, and I have dwelt on no detailed part of the general argument that has been heard here in these two days. But another reason occurs to me, and that is that the combing out of the questionnaires and the passing upon the claims for exemption of all the men beyond the present draft ages would be a tremendous task of time and labor, and by the terms of the McKenzie amendment until it is completed these young men can not be used. Nobody can accurately estimate how much time that will take. It may take one period of time or it may take another, but in the meanwhile it is certain that until it is done and the older men drafted these other men can not be touched. These men are waiting in the meantime, and, as has been suggested time and again, these men are all of such age and under such social, domestic, and economic relationships that their questionnaires will be very simple and their examination and adjudication take very little time. There is a great army that could be quickly raised. That we know for a certainty. And, as has been pointed out, time is the essence of the present war situation.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Then, the result would be that these boys would be sent before the others; otherwise the bill would be of no account.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No. Part of the men above present draft ages may be in the Army, and part of these other men, too; but all of them, no matter where they come from, no matter what group or groups of age, would be on the way together.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I have only half a minute left and there is one more thought that I wish to express. It all comes down again to this: That if you want to be very sure that you will not hinder the Government in the raising, training, and use of this Army you can make it absolutely sure by not putting anything in the law that has any possibility of doing that. But if you want to restrain and restrict, no refinement of words or anything else written into this statute will determine the degree of your restriction and your restraint, until all at once, in the middle of the night, some unforeseen contingency arises, your statutory limitation is in effect, and you can not get another statute passed in time to cure the difficulty you had put in the way.

The best illustration of what these little things may do that I can give is that of Gulliver among the Lilliputians. You remember that Gulliver among the Lilliputians was a giant, a great, unconquerable giant, but they caught him asleep and then they bound him helpless to the earth by simple little packthread. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is not with any expectation or hope of changing anyone's views that I trespass upon the time of the committee this afternoon. I simply want to place in the RECORD my position upon this question. I am strongly in favor of the McKenzie amendment. [Applause.] I have consistently supported all of the measures in behalf of the war, and I intend to do so to-day and in the future when they appeal to my judgment and conscience; but I want to say that as a Member of Congress I realize that the responsibility for calling these boys to the front is ours, and we can not wash that responsibility off our hands by simply saying that those who are in charge of the conduct of the war must be given these boys at this time. Before the bar of the country are not we, within our proper function, as much responsible for the conduct of the war as any other agency of this Government? I, for one, want to tell you that, no matter how hard you may try, you can not wash away the responsibility of this Congress of sending 18-year-old boys to the trenches of France while men above the age of 21 and up to 45 are at home, not only safe and sound, but making more money than they have ever made before in all their lives out of the Government and in industrial pursuits and in Government contracts. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] is always dramatic in his arguments and addresses before this House. When he does not bring implements of warfare to display here, when he does not appear panoplied in all of the toggery of war, he produces something that is just as spectacular; and so, with the dramatic instinct highly developed, he stood before this House, prearranged, of course, as it was, and had four young marines of the age of 18 years rise over there in the gallery to prove that boys of 18 should be drafted without resorting to those now in deferred classes. I want to say that if the gentleman from Connecticut had chosen to do so he could have looked to another portion of the gallery and have seen not only

4 but 40—yes, 100—men in civilian clothes above the age of 21 and under 45 who would look just as good in uniforms as the heroic young marines. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BLANTON. Does my colleague know that one of those marines up in the gallery will be 19 years of age in December and another one will be 19 in January?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not know anything about that. I admire the marines. I admire anybody who volunteers and goes into the Army, though he is under 21 years of age; but I have not yet reached the point where I want to say to these boys of 18, "Whether you will or whether you will not, we will reach into your homes and take you and put you into the front ranks in France when some other fellow 25 years old who happens to be a secretary or clerk to some influential person is safely ensconced at home." [Applause.] Why, the other afternoon I was riding over to Camp Meade in a car, and when I got out here a few miles a fellow who was waiting for a street car hailed me and said, "May I ride with you?" I was glad to let him ride. He rode along a mile or so and I asked him, "How old are you, young man?" He said, "I am 23." I said, "Are you married?" He said, "No." I said, "How is it that the draft did not get you?" He was a great, big, athletic, strapping fellow. He said, "Why, I am the secretary over here at the Maryland Agricultural College and I was given deferred classification."

Are you willing to let that fellow stay at home filling a woman's job or the job some married man would be glad to get and draft some 18-year-old boy, whether he wants to go or not, and put him in the front-line trenches without waiting until all class 1 men above 18 are drafted?

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that if the House had adopted the Shallenberger amendment, which you voted down two months ago, you would have had half a million more men in class 1 than you have to-day. The War Department now has the authority to comb the lists of class 2, class 3, and class 4, and put many now in these classes where they ought to be—in class 1. I have no son that will be affected by the 18-year-old provision. I have no brother that is affected, but I am not willing to take your boy and put him in the ranks when some other man's boy 25 or perhaps 26 is at home enjoying all the comforts of luxurious living. Why can there be any objection to the adoption of the amendment providing that the boards shall not call the 18 and 19 year old boys until they shall have first called those above that age?

The time of Mr. CONNALLY of Texas having expired, by unanimous consent he was given two minutes more.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. We are not denying the War Department the power to reach down and get 18 and 19 year old boys when it needs them. They can be called when the necessity arises, but gentlemen espousing the bill will not agree to any limitation whatever. The result will be that they will call the 18 and 19 year old boys at once, and perhaps before they do the older ones. It is easier to classify them; they are not married, and they have no dependents. The result will be that they will be called to the colors first.

Mr. GORDON. And they have no votes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. And they have no votes. This reminds me of the story of the preacher that had a new assignment. When he first went to his new post he began to preach against whisky drinking. One member called him aside and said, "That won't do; old Brother So-and-so is an elder and he will have his toddy; you will have to preach against something else." So he preached against card playing, and they said: "Sister So-and-So is a great card player, and she contributes liberally to the church; you will have to cut that out." Then he gave horse racing a run or two, and they said there was a member of the church from Kentucky who was fond of horse racing, and he would have to cut that out. Then he said, "What in God's name can I preach about?" And they said, "Preach against the Jews; there ain't any of them here." [Laughter and applause.]

My friends, I want to say to you that I am willing now, and willing in the future, to give the War Department all the money and all the men it needs. We have already given it 10,000,000 men, and this bill, without taking the 18-year-old boys, will give it——

Mr. GORDON. Twelve million more.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I thank the gentleman from Ohio who always has the figures collated in his mind. Twelve million men that we will give the War Department, and if it does not get them in it is its responsibility, not ours. Let me tell you something. Congress has some responsibility. [Applause.] Congress has some duties to perform, and the Constitution puts the man power of this country in the palm of our hands. We are the ones whose duty it is to say when and how the man power shall be drafted. I want to say to you that I am not in favor of going down and taking the boys of 18 until you have drafted those above that age who are liable to service. France has not found it necessary to do it, England has not found it necessary to do it, and I do not believe it is necessary at this time in the United States, and I trust that the McKenzie amendment will be adopted overwhelmingly. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. EAGLE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 168. Joint resolution tendering public acknowledgment of gratitude to the Army and Navy of the United States.

TEMPORARY INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have listened to this debate with a great deal of attention, and I confess that at this moment I am getting weary of the constant recurrence to the alleged fact that there are about 8,000,000 men who are in the deferred classifications. Of course there are. In the name of Heaven, why did you pass the selective-service law if you did not contemplate such a result? Was not it the intention of the President in making these regulations to pay due deference and respect to the industries and the agriculture of the country, and can you not at least give the local boards the credit for honest judgment and loyalty in making these classifications? Why throw this constant threat and complaint in the face of the local boards? Do you not know that that is a criticism of the selective-service act that you passed? Do you not know that it is a criticism of the President of the United States, your Commander in Chief?

All this talk about "combing out" the deferred classifications is unwarranted and idle. The local boards were required to classify the registrants in accordance with their obligations to their families and to the industrial needs of the Nation. They could not have done other than they did without failing in their duty. The fault is not with them, but with the intricacy and gigantic nature of the task that was given them.

I have been trying to fathom the animus of the advocates of this McKenzie amendment, and at last it was disclosed in the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who threatened to send Mr. Gompers to hell. May I ask the gentleman if that is an invitation to Mr. Gompers to go to Texas? [Laughter.] They say that in the summer time its temperature closely approaches that of hades.

There is the animus—opposition to the labor unions. Now, gentlemen, do you not know that the majority of the men who have been put into the deferred classification are engaged in industries which are essential to the war, and would it surprise you, or need it surprise you, to learn that the majority of those men engaged in riveting the steel structures of our ships and in the other industries essential to this war are members of labor unions?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I stated that when Mr. Gompers asked us to do with organized labor something that was not right, then so and so should happen, and I would like to ask the gentleman what he would say to Mr. Gompers if Mr. Gompers told him that the proposition of work or fight should not apply to the laboring class of people of America.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do not want to go into that now.

Mr. BLANTON. I did not think the gentleman would.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I have not the time for it.

We ought not to complain of the number of men who are in the deferred classes. That was the very design and purpose of the selective-service regulations; that is, to raise an army with the least possible derangement of family ties, social obligations, and industrial requirements. In order to make war we must also maintain the peace industries of the country. In order to keep one man on the fighting line, well fed, well clothed, and properly sustained and equipped, 20 human beings—men, women, and children—must be kept at their usual vocations and maintained in reasonable comfort and peace of mind at home. Do not forget that. We are prone in our enthusiasm for war sacrifice to forget that the usual order at home must so nearly as possible be maintained. Otherwise we endanger the lines of communication with our fighting men, jeopardize their lives, and endanger our cause. The men who raise the crops, who dig in the mines, who make clothing, munitions, armament, and equipment of war must also live, because if they fail our soldiers will fail and our cause and the cause of the world will be lost.

We ought not therefore to complain of the number of men who are retained in useful tasks at home, nor assume, because their number seems to be large, that the local boards have necessarily failed in their duty. As chairman of the legal advisory board connected with one of the local districts I can vouch for the industry and patriotism with which they generally performed their exceedingly difficult and embarrassing duties. If they are subject to any criticism at all, I would say that they might rather be criticized for their zeal, which in many instances worked grievous injustice.

Under the leave granted me to extend my remarks I shall take the liberty to append a few specific instances, with some suggestions in the way of modification of the selective-service regulations, which I am satisfied will remove some of the objections to the proposed extension of the draft ages.

Another fallacy that has appeared in this debate is this: Gentlemen have rung the changes upon the alleged change of view upon the part of the military authorities of this country. I need not refer gentlemen of the dignity and experience of this body to the old maxim, "The wise man changes his mind, the fool never." Some have asked what has happened since June last to cause this change in mind. Have the gentlemen lost sight of the great battle of the Marne? Have they lost sight of the fact that the Prussians are being driven back? Have they lost sight of the fact that now it is essential to concentrate every effort of the people of this country, of every class, in order to win this war? That has happened since June, and that is sufficient reason to cause a change of mind. Another favorite fallacy of the advocates of the McKenzie amendment is the slogan, "Let this be a man's war." Gentlemen, there never was a man's war, in that sense, in the history of the world, and there never will be a man's war. Wars have been fought by boys; wars have been caused by men of juvenile minds. This present war was caused by a man who was suffering from arrested development both of mind and body. In the Civil War there were under 21 years of age 2,159,798 soldiers. Over 26 years of age there were only 46,000. The bulk of the fighting was done by boys. Germany to-day has 2,500,000 men in the field under 21 years of age.

Mr. GORDON. Where does the gentleman get those figures? That is a new discovery.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I decline to answer now, but I will give it to the gentleman later. They say that Germany having boys in the field is a sign of weakness. Thank God, Mr. Chairman, it is a sign of weakness; but with us, our boys in the field will be a sign of strength and of victory. My position is this: I shall oppose the McKenzie amendment, with all due deference to the opinion of others who have taken the contrary view; but my opinion is that the McKenzie amendment is an attempt to throw a monkey wrench into the machinery of the war campaign. It is essential that we should all get behind the President and the military authorities in order to prosecute this war and do away, not with sentiment—for it is not sentiment—but with emotionalism. It would seem that you imagine that if the boys from 18 to 21 are called they are going to go over to the trenches the next day. Do you not realize that it will take a year to train them?

The chief objection that I have to the Johnson amendment is that it is not only unnecessary but perilously restrictive. On page 2 of the bill, lines 5 to 7, the President has the power, which as Commander in Chief of our armies he ought to have, to "draft such persons liable to military service in such sequence of ages and at such time or times as he may prescribe." Do gentlemen presume to suggest that the President should not be vested with this power? No; that issue they evade. All they want is to make sure that the calls for men shall be in the order that they think ought to be followed. And in order to make sure that that sequence shall be followed they propose to tie him hand and foot with a congressional mandate. Gentlemen, I do not believe such a course is patriotic; in fact, I believe it would be perilous.

The exercise of just a little reflection will show how utterly groundless are all their fears about sending striplings of 18 into the trenches. In the first place, only boys physically fit will be called. A boy of the size and build of the lad of whom the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] made an exhibition to-day by putting upon his slender frame a uniform three sizes too large, will not be chosen for military duty. Only lads of the standard size and strength will be chosen. The page I pointed out is only 15 years old, and yet he is head and shoulders over the one selected by the gentleman for his "horrible example." I have a nephew in France to-day only 18 years of age who fills the bill as to the Army requirements, and he did not have to get a waiver to join either, except from his mother, and that, let me say, was patriotically given.

Just let us remember that if the boys of 18 are called at all, they must have from six months to a year's training before they will be sent to the other side. Then military wisdom will most probably dictate that they be used in taking the place of the older and longer trained men along the lines of communication and in the various noncombatant branches of the Army. Remember that in the disposition of a great army never more than one-third is on the fighting line. One-third is usually in reserve and another third is required in the supply and communication branches of the service. The inevitable task to which the boys of 18 will be assigned will be to release the older men for the fighting lines.

The proposal before us is strictly a war measure, and as such I am in favor of leaving all discretion under it and its enforcement in the hands of the President and his military advisors, who have so far so ably raised and so gloriously conducted our armies to victory.

APPENDIX.

SOME SUGGESTIONS FOR THE MODIFICATION OF THE SELECTIVE-SERVICE REGULATIONS TO SECURE THEIR STRICT ENFORCEMENT, PROVIDE FOR PROPER REVIEW, AND SECURE ECONOMY IN THE CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

In the foregoing speech I said, in substance, that rather than deserving criticism for excessive vigilance in catering to the deferred classes, the local boards might more justly be criticized for their zeal in trying to enlarge class 1. The following are a few instances:

Case 1: A man who, when his claim for deferred service on account of dependents was denied wanted to be permitted to join the Navy, in which he had served one enlistment. He is now in France in the Infantry, when it is obvious he could have rendered more useful service to his country in the Navy.

Case 2: A man who, for flat feet, was discharged from the Army, in which he had voluntarily enlisted, who notwithstanding his physical disability was almost immediately put into class 1–A by his local board and inducted again into the service. He is denied the honor and glory of serving his country voluntarily and must bear the odium (unjust though it be) of being driven to serve his flag against his will.

Case 3 (a companion picture to the preceding): A man who was inducted by his local board into the Army, notwithstanding his flat feet, and because he was not able, on account of his disability, to keep pace with his company, was court-martialed and is now languishing in disgrace in the Army prison at Fort Jay.

Case 4: A man, not a citizen of the United States, now serving in France, who has two brothers in the Italian Army. He is the sole support of aged parents. He failed through ignorance to take advantage of his privilege in his questionnaire to claim exemption, and the local board refused to permit him to correct his error.

Case 5: A man, the sole wage earner in a family consisting of an invalid father almost blind, an invalid mother, a brother totally blind from birth, and an invalid sister. He, too, is in France because the local board arbitrarily ignored Rule VIII, section 75, of the selective-service regulations, which provides that any registrant having aged or invalid parents mainly dependent on his labor for support shall be put in class 3.

Case 6: A man with a wife and three small children—with another about to be born—put in class 1. The widow gets, all told, $47.50 per month to support herself and little family; to do which she is compelled to live in three rooms in an unsanitary location. This soldier costs the Government $62.50 per month.

Case 7: A man with a dependent mother, wife, and three children. He costs the Government $77.50 per month, and his aged mother, wife, and young children are deprived of his personal aid, comfort, and supervision.

These instances are within my own experience, and doubtless within the experience of my colleagues may be found to be multiplied a hundredfold.

The evils resulting from these abuses are not merely confined to the individual; they expand like a contagion and diffuse a sentiment of resentment which is hurtful to our cause.

Surely with 10,000,000 registrants we do not need men so badly that we should countenance injustice and jeopardize a healthy home sentiment.

Some of these abuses are attempted to be justified by the argument that the Government makes allowances to dependents.

I think Congress should give serious thought to this subject also, and inquire if it is wise policy to fill the Army with the solitary wage earners of families when its ranks might just as well be filled with those who are free of family burdens.

The making of these allowances has necessitated the organization of a huge bureau, involving intricate bookkeeping and entailing an outlay of millions of dollars. Seventy-seven dollars a month is certainly too much to pay per month for a man in the ranks. Why not amend the law and enact a hard-and-fast provision prohibiting the assignment to class 1-A of all registrants having dependents compelled to rely mainly on the United States Treasury.

It will be observed that many of these cases seem to be in direct violation of the selective-service regulations promulgated by the President. So they are. But who is to set matters right? In nearly every instance appeals have been taken and relief denied. The Provost Marshal General claims he has no power and the Supreme Court of the United States refuses to assume jurisdiction.

In the case of George O. Kitzcrow, although it was plain that the local board violated the rules under which they purported to act, the Supreme Court of the United States handed down on June 3 last a decision of which this body, it would seem, ought to take some cognizance. It decided that the courts of our land have no jurisdiction to review the determinations of the local draft boards.

In enacting the selective-draft law, Congress could have placed some limitation upon the powers of the local board. It chose to delegate its powers to another branch of the Government. It could have prescribed some bounds to the regulations to be promulgated by the President through the Provost Marshal General. It failed to do so. Now, the Supreme Court of the United States holds that the regulations in question do not prescribe or provide a judicial or quasi judicial proceeding which might under our judicial system be reviewed by our courts; but that the selective-draft-service regulations are simply rules prescribing the method of enforcing an administrative or executive act, and therefore, being the act of the Executive, they can not be reviewed.

While vested with all the equity powers of a judicial tribunal, the local boards refuse to exercise the privilege which they possess to correct errors and right the most obvious wrongs.

One of the consequences of this and a sequel which is of immediate interest to this body, is the vast number of appeals which are made to individual Members of Congress to intercede at Washington to correct errors and right wrongs for which the selective-service-draft regulations should provide an adequate, orderly, and lawful remedy.

The new draft law went into effect on June 5, and an effort should be made immediately to profit by our past experience and make such modifications of the law and the regulations as will avoid past errors, correct defects, and supply deficiencies which will make the duty of raising an army and navy a solemn function, protected on every side by all of the safeguards which our traditions and our history have taught us to esteem and respect.

In my connection with the local draft boards I observed that not sufficient care is devoted to appeals. The district boards to whom the appeals are made perform their work hurriedly and often perfunctorily. In the modification of the regulations I suggest that advantage be taken of the local law boards, which, composed as they are of lawyers of patriotism and high standing, have devoted so much of their time, night and day for months, in order to facilitate the draft. As constituted they are purely volunteers often looked upon as interlopers by the members of the local law boards and curtailed in their duties simply to the assisting of registrants in filling out questionnaires. In many instances they have had to witness acts of injustice without being able to correct them. Why not select from these local law boards appellate boards to whom appeals can be taken in the first instance, having the district boards to pass on the few cases which might filter through?

And in the modification of this law we might well give some thought to the wisdom of extending the duties of the draft boards to the furnishing of men for the Navy as well as the Army.

The theory of the draft law is that it should be selective; that as its purpose is to be fair, broad, general, and just, it should be discriminating and not discriminatory. Therefore the regulations providing for its enforcement should first aim to obtain a census of the youth of our country within the prescribed ages, setting out their physical, mental, and vocational qualifications, and then assign them to the branches of the Army or Navy to which they are best fitted and in which they may render the highest and most efficient service.

Why should not this intelligent and intelligible method be applied to the Navy as well as to the Army? Why permit men to volunteer in the Navy when they can no longer volunteer in the Army?

It is self-evident that when once the draft law goes into effect all voluntary enlistments should cease. Yet that policy is not followed. The threat of induction into the draft army has brought thousands of applicants clamoring to get voluntarily into the Navy, the Quartermaster Corps, the Ordnance Corps, and other branches of the service before the net tightens around them.

While the draft law may make men slackers at heart, heroes against their will, the open door permitting men to evade the draft by getting into the naval and certain branches of the military service will enable certain types of men to parade for years to come as veterans of this great war who have not an ounce of patriotism or valor in their bosoms. This is not fair either to the adventurous volunteer who promptly answered the first call of patriotism and gave his service freely without spur or goad or fear, nor is it just to those sturdy and devoted men of our National Army who, having an instinctive abhorrence of war and all that it implies, nevertheless when the solemn summons came assumed without fear or evasion the rôle of warriors and now stand ready to offer up their lives for the honor of our flag and the freedom of mankind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the American people, in my judgment, are prepared to make any sacrifice required to win this war. There never has been a people in all time more thoroughly united and more desperately in earnest than are the American people in the support of their Government at this time. They will acquiesce in and loyally support any change in the draft law Congress may deem it wise and necessary to make; but I have no doubt if this proposition to lower the draft to 18 years was submitted to the people for an expression of their opinion, either as to its necessity or its wisdom, it would be overwhelmingly rejected by them, and I think properly so.

Since our entrance into the war I have supported every proposition advanced here and urged by the administration that I thought would strengthen the Government and assist in a vigorous prosecution of the war. I have voted to furnish every man and every dollar deemed necessary by the War Department. I am now ready to do that, and will continue to do so until the end.

We are told by the authorities it is necessary to enlarge our Army to 5,000,000 men. I am in favor of furnishing the men and voting all the money necessary to equip and maintain such an Army. The size of the Army required and its proper equipment is purely a military matter, in which I think Congress should follow the judgment of our military authorities. The manner in which the Army is to be raised and enlarged, however, is a legislative matter coming entirely within the province and power of Congress upon which Congress should exercise its own best judgment. The Constitution vests this authority and this power in Congress, and we should not surrender our own judgment to the military authorities or to any other authority.

We now have an Army of 3,000,000 men. It is required to raise an additional 2,000,000 to have an Army such as the Secretary of War and the military authorities say is needed.

I have listened carefully to the debates and have failed to hear a single argument advanced convincing to me of the necessity of lowering the draft age to 18 to secure the additional men required. There is no argument against raising the age limit to 45. The whole country approves of that proposition. It is estimated there are 21,000,000 men in the country between the ages of 21 and 45. Three million are already in the Army, leaving 18,000,000 to draw from to get the required extra 2,000,000. Does anyone undertake to say these 2,000,000 men can not be obtained out of this great reservoir of man power, and obtained quickly and easily? No one except the military authorities, who seem determined to take a million to a million and a half of boys under age out of the schools and high schools and off the farms and put them in the Army.

We should not take a single boy under age by the draft until every available man physically fit and liable for military service under the rules and regulations of the draft has been taken between the ages of 21 and 45 years. When all who are eligible and liable for military service between these ages have been taken will be time enough to take boys of 18 years. If that time comes, and it is necessary, the whole people will willingly and loyally say take the youths of the land. They will never favor such a proposition, however, until that time comes.

Mr. Chairman, this is a man's war, as has been repeatedly said here. It should be fought by men. It seems to me we can not afford at this early period of our participation in the war to admit such poverty in man power as to be compelled to call upon mere boys to fight our battles.

England with only half our population raised an army of more than 6,000,000 men and was well into the fourth year of the war before calling to the colors her boys under 20 years of age.

Canada refuses to take by the draft boys under 20 years of age, and France, noble, heroic France, who has suffered so terribly and has been bled white, be it said to her everlasting credit has at no time during the struggle called her 18-year-old boys into her army. With her soil overrun and the ruthless invader at the very gates of Paris, she has resolutely refused during four long and terrible years to do the thing the American Congress is now about to do. Brave, chivalrous France, can we not follow her human example? Should we not hesitate and think twice before we do a thing France in all her suffering and her extremity has refused to do? Out of a population of less than 40,000,000 she has raised and maintained her great armies of between five and six million soldiers, and yet we are told here in America, with a potential man power of 21,000,000 between 21 and 45, we can not raise an army of 5,000,000 men without drafting our 18-year-old boys. This contention, if true, is most humiliating and proves either one of two things—that our men of military age are woefully unfit physically or that we are a nation of professional slackers. But the contention is not true. We can raise an army of 5,000,000 men and raise it easily without taking boys under age. No one can doubt this for a minute. It is our duty to do it. It can be done by raising the age limit to 45 or 50 if necessary and then combing out of classes 2, 3, and 4 at least a million if not a million and a half of men who under a fair construction of the selective-draft act are liable for military service and should be called before invading the nursery and the schoolroom to obtain fighting men.

Why should the fathers and mothers of America be asked to make greater sacrifices than the Governments of our allies have required of their citizens? Germany, of all the great nations at war, has put mere striplings into the firing line. The civilized world has condemned her. We should not follow her example.

Let us go on as we have begun and create an army of men—5,000,000 mature men—not an army of boys.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I fully realize that what I might say will have no effect upon Members as to how they cast their votes on this measure, but I do feel as if I ought to express my feelings at this time. I was one of the many Members of this House who voted for the declaration of war against the Imperial Government of Germany, and after that declaration of war I knew that the American people would prosecute this war to the bitter end, and I was under the impression that after this Government declared war upon the Imperial Government of Germany that we placed the responsibility of carrying on this war on the President of the United States and the General Staff of the Army and Navy. It was on the President of the United States and the General Staff of the Army and Navy that we placed this responsibility. We looked to them to equip this Army, train it, and send it to France. Now, since that time I have been inclined to follow the judgment of those military men. I have heard Members say on the floor of this House for the last two days that we ought to use our own judgment on this question. Now, I am frank to admit that my judgment on military affairs does not amount to the snap of my finger, and I want to ask some of you men, What does your judgment amount to when it comes to carrying on this great war? Have you ever had any military training or experience? The only men I know on the floor of this House who are able to pass judgment on this question are the men who have seen previous military service, and every one of the Members, except Gen. SHERWOOD and Col. LITTLE, of Kansas, who have seen previous military service, have stood on this floor and advocated the voting down of the McKenzie amendment. Do you men believe—I want to ask you Democrats this question—do you believe that the great President of the United States, this great President whom you men have stood here and lauded to the skies as the greatest statesman in the world to-day—do you believe that he wants to send these boys like lambs to the slaughterhouse? No; the great President of the United States is just as much concerned about the welfare of these boys as you are. I have heard a great deal about babies and children. Now, it seems to me that there is a matter of sentiment connected with the taking of these 18-year-old boys.

I want to say to you men there was a matter of sentiment connected with the declaration of war, and if this Congress had listened to sentiment we never would have declared war against the Imperial Government of Germany. When we voted on the question of war that was not a question of sentiment; it was a question of right or wrong. Now, it seems to me that the question we are facing to-day is that the President of the United States and the General Staff of the Army and Navy come to this Congress and say that they want certain things in order to prosecute this war and bring it to a speedy end. Now, as far as I am concerned I am going to be guided by their judgment and not follow the opinion of those who have no responsibility in regard to the prosecution of this war. Now, if it is morally wrong to draft these boys of 18 to 20, how does it come that we have 244,000 of these young men in the military and naval forces of the United States, some of them fighting the splendid battles on the firing line of France to-day. If it is morally wrong to draft them, it is morally wrong for this country to let them enlist and go to the war.

I have one son who is 19 years of age, stands 6 feet tall, and weighs 175 pounds. To-day he is serving in the Tank Corps in the service of the United States, and I feel prouder of that boy than I ever felt before. [Applause.] I only wish that the other four sons we have in our home were 18 years of age or more, so that they could put on Uncle Sam's uniform and go into this great fight.

A great many of the men who have stood here and advocated the McKenzie amendment to-day have no boys of their own. They have no sense of feeling that is in the heart of a father, yet they stand here and attempt to speak for the patriotic fathers and mothers of our country. Have you heard from your constituents? Have you heard from the fathers and mothers of your district asking you to vote for this McKenzie amendment? I come from a district where there is no race suicide—none at all——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. May I have three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I come from a district and city where there is no race suicide, where there are thousands and thousands of these young men in high-school to-day, and I have only heard from two men in opposition to taking these 18-year-old boys, and one of these is a man that was born in Germany and has pro-German sentiments.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I can not yield. I have only three minutes.

Have you heard from the mothers of this country in regard to taking these boys? I say, God bless the American mothers. It is the American mothers who are making the supreme sacrifice at this hour. Not long ago I visited the home of a friend of mine. They have two sons, both under the age of 21, who are now serving on the firing line in France. I talked to the mother about the boys and she said to me, "It was hard for me to part with my sons. They are all I have in this world." The tears ran down her cheeks, but she seemed to catch herself and shake off her emotion, and said, "I would not have them any other place at this time." That is the spirit of the American mother, and that is the spirit that is going to win this war.

But I have heard it said on the floor of this House to-day that it is the great manufacturing centers of this country that are in favor of taking the boys 18 years old. I want to say to you that I come from probably one of the greatest manufacturing districts in this country, where we have thousands and thousands of men working in our steel plants. In the city of Youngstown there is a population of 160,000, and in the county there are 220,000, and that county has already furnished 12,000 young men in this war. The great manufacturing city which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] comes from, Cleveland, has furnished 40,000 men in this war. And I want to say to some of you men who are opposing this administration bill, if your States had furnished as many men as the industrial States have we would have enough men in the Army to-day. My constituents trust and have confidence in the judgment of the President of the United States to carry on this war, and I am going to follow their wishes to-day and stand with him on this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] is recognized.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, according to the Security League, I have a clean record on war legislation during this session of Congress. I do not know whether I am going to keep it or not. I have voted for every war measure since we were called together in extra session to declare war. I am ready to vote to send the boys of 19 years of age to war whenever it becomes necessary to do so, and I am willing to vote to send the boys of 18 years of age to war whenever it becomes necessary to do so. But I am not willing to vote to send the 18-year-old boys or the 19-year-old boys into this war simply because it is more convenient to the War Department to get them together than it is to get men who are older than that. [Applause.]

Now, then, I believe that there are still a great many men in this country between the ages of 21 and 31 that can be sent to the front, and ought to be sent. I believe that there are a great many men of draft age engaged in nonessential industries who could be transferred to the more essential industries and thereby release from these industries a great many men that have been exempted on industrial grounds. Until the men between the ages of 21 and 31 have first been recombed and those that are found available are sent to the front, I will not vote to send the 18-year-old boys to the front. And then there is another thing I want to call to the attention of the House, because it has been called particularly to my attention since I have been to my district recently. There are hundreds of thousands of foreigners in this country, subjects of our cobelligerents, that could be made available for war service immediately if steps were taken to do so.

In some of the counties of my district where there were large foreign populations almost every young American of draft age has been taken to the war, and their places have been filled by Italians and Belgians and Frenchmen, who have claimed exemption because they are not citizens. Now, we passed a bill through the House last winter which would require those men either to go into this war and fight for this country or return home to fight for their own countries, but that bill has been held up at the other end of the Capitol, and nothing has been done up to this time to compel these thousands and thousands of Italians, Frenchmen, and Belgians who are here taking the places of American young men in the different industries to fight, while our own young men have gone to the war to fight for their countries as well as ours. Now, until we can get hold of this large force of foreigners whose countries are cobelligerents with us in fighting against the German Empire, and either put them into the service or permit their Governments to put them into the service, I am not in favor of taking our own 18-year-old boys.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman has just made a very interesting statement—that there were thousands of Frenchmen, Belgians, and Italians who were alien citizens——

Mr. DENISON. Not citizens, but subjects of those countries residing here.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has the gentleman the statistics on the alien population he has just mentioned?

Mr. DENISON. I have not the statistics in my mind, but I have just had the figures handed to me by my friend from Ohio, Mr. McCULLOCH, and it seems, from the report of the Provost Marshal General, that there are 772,744 nationals of cobelligerent countries registered under the present draft law.

Mr. BURNETT. That is, between the ages of 21 and 31?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; between the ages of 21 and 31, under the last registration; and it is estimated that under this extension of the draft law we are now considering there would be perhaps 2,000,000 subjects of cobelligerent countries residing in this country and earning high wages in our industries who can not be brought into this war unless we make them go in. I am in favor of bringing them into the war before we take our own 18-year-old boys. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman does not want aliens to do the fighting for this country?

Mr. DENISON. I want them to be either fighting for this country or for their own countries, since our country and theirs are both fighting a life-and-death struggle with a common enemy.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to have them all fight for our country, if they will not fight for their own, while we are fighting to help save their countries from destruction.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I may have misunderstood the gentleman, but I understood him to say that many thousand Belgians, Frenchmen, and Italians are registered in his district who can not be included in the draft.

Mr. DENISON. I said there are thousands and thousands of them in this country. There are a great many of them in my district and in my own county, particularly at the cities of Herrin and Johnston City, Ill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Of course, the justice of your last observation appears to all of us; but what about the time it will take to do this while the other men are ready and waiting and not used?

Mr. DENISON. The time is not a question that this House can be held responsible for, because we passed that bill last winter.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But we can not predicate our future action upon the mistakes of the past. We can not afford to say that because of the mistakes that have been made in the past we should delay now.

Mr. DENISON. Other departments of the Government should not cause such delays and then put the responsibility upon the House.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is a question of our responsibility now.

Mr. DENISON. We have a great deal more man power than the Provost Marshal General can take now if he wants to do so. They are already registered. [Applause.]

Mr. McCULLOCH. I desire to say to the gentleman that when this section is disposed of I expect to offer an amendment along that line.

Mr. DENISON. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will do so. I think it ought to be done.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman is much more familiar with the question than I am, but I have a recollection that we have a treaty with Italy that prevents our taking their citizens into our Army.

Mr. DENISON. Yes; but that treaty can be abrogated at any time. It did not contemplate conditions that now exist. It is many years old, and now that Italy and our other allies are fighting with us against a common enemy, the gentleman from Tennessee knows as well as I do that that treaty can easily be changed or abrogated in a short time and it should be done.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I know; but I do not want to see our treaty made a scrap of paper.

Mr. DENISON. I know; neither do I, but we have had a similar treaty with England, and we got rid of that pretty quickly, and we ought to do the same with the treaties with Italy and France; and in order to see that it is done Congress should take steps now to see that those men are brought into this war who are now enjoying high wages here while our boys are in France fighting.

Now, fellow Members, just a short time ago Gen. Crowder issued a statement to the effect that he was going to begin "combing" the industries. I have always thought that "combing" was a pretty good thing, and I think it will be a pretty good thing now in the administration of this draft law. When the Provost Marshal General said he could raise more men by a process of "combing" he also at the same time issued his "work-or-fight" order. No sooner had that been done than certain influences began to get busy here in Washington. Big business was heard from; the captains of industry said business would be disorganized; and then the War Department suddenly changed its policy, and concluded there were not enough men in this country to win this war, so they would ask Congress to go down and take the 18 and 19 year old boys.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he will vote for a further amendment giving further authority to carry out this combing process?

Mr. DENISON. I certainly will.

Mr. TREADWAY. I beg to say that I intend to offer such an amendment.

Mr. DENISON. I will vote for that, but it is not necessary. The Provost Marshal General now has the power to do it.

Mr. TREADWAY. He needs additional power.

Mr. DENISON. If he needs additional power, I am in favor of giving it to him. But I am not in favor of letting the German people and the German Government know that this country at this time, with over 100,000,000 people, is obliged to send boys of 18 to the war. Now, I am willing, as I said awhile ago, to vote to send the 19-year-old boys or the 18-year-old boys to the war whenever it becomes necessary to do so. But I reserve the right to use my judgment as a Member of the House to say when the necessity shall arise, and I want to protest now and here against the statements that have been made by different Members during this debate that any attempt on the part of the House to amend this bill is throwing a monkey wrench into the machinery. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I intend to support every measure that will enable the President to use all the resources of the country to win the war with victory, and do it as soon as possible. I am in favor of raising and equipping an army of 5,000,000, or even 6,000,000, men as soon as possible. I shall vote to authorize drafting all men between the ages of 18 and 45 if the bill can not be amended by the House so as to exclude the 18-year-old boys from its provisions. But I hope the bill, if it can not be so amended, may pass as reported by the Military Affairs Committee.

I am in favor of the McKenzie amendment approved by the committee, which would require the War Department to call the 18 and 19 year old boys last after all others in class 1 have been called. I do not believe this amendment would delay or obstruct the War Department one day in raising an army according to the enlarged program. If I thought it would I am sure I would hesitate to vote for it.

But however the bill is finally passed, I hope the Provost Marshal General will use the powers that have been granted him and have the classifications of the different local boards reexamined, so that there may be a more uniform administration of the draft law, and thousands of able-bodied men who have been given deferred classification may be placed in class 1. I hope he will have the industries of the country carefully "combed," so that thousands who can be spared may be sent to the Army. Men with dependent families can be taken from nonessential industries and substituted for single men now working in the essential industries who have been granted exemption, and those men could thereby be released for military service. Above all, I would like to see the millions of subjects of our cobelligerent nations—the Italians, Belgians, French, and Greeks—now residing in this country, taking the places of our own boys who have gone to the war, either drafted into our own Army or sent home to fight for their own countries.

If these things had been done before now, or could now be done, I believe the War Department could raise all the men necessary for the Army under the enlarged military program, and it would not be necessary to call the 18-year-old boys at all. Many boys of 18 or 19 years are capable of fighting as well or better than men. But many are not. I think we should fight this war with men as far as it is possible to do so. I think at the very least, we should approve this McKenzie amendment and require the calling of the 18 and 19 year old boys to the Army last.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have been listening to the debate upon this amendment for almost two days. At one time I intended to support the McKenzie amendment. But the more we think about it, gentlemen, the more we come to the conclusion that we can not fight this war in the Halls of Congress but must fight it on the fields in France. There are those of us whose loved ones have already made all the sacrifices possible. The soil of France has been made red with their blood. And shall we say that they have fought and died in vain? The battle is not yet over. We have just commenced to fight, and since the middle of July our boys have had the Huns on the run. The department has called upon Congress for an increase of man power to support these boys over there. In our war resolution we pledged all our man power and resources to end this wholesale murder of our men, women, and children. They ask for our 18 and 19 year old boys but tell us that the 18-year-old boys will not be called until last and only when absolutely necessary. The McKenzie amendment proposes to write that into law; and, after all, gentlemen, that is all that amendment amounts to. The fact is that many of those who are in favor of this amendment do not favor the granting of the request for those 18 and 19 years old. It is not a question of classification with them, but whether the request for man power below 21 should be granted at all.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], who just preceded me, said that he was not going to vote to grant the request of the War Department until he himself is convinced of the necessity. I grant him that right. But what further proof does he want? The War Department is asking for this legislation and has furnished proof in their testimony before the committee, which has been submitted to us. I repeat, what further proof does he want? Gen. Pershing needs the men. Does he want him to leave the battle field in France and appear before Congress in person and add his testimony to that of Gen. Crowder, Gen. March, and Secretary of War Baker? Does he want these men, who now have the enemy on the run, to leave their posts of duty and appear before us? They want more men. Gen. March says, "You give us 4,000,000 men and we will walk through the German lines wherever and whenever we please." Delay in granting this request for more man power may mean the loss of thousands of men now in France. Shall we sacrifice them first by keeping the fight equally balanced? Shall we wait until they again drive our lines back as they did last March, or shall we continue to keep them on the run? It does not take the experience of a soldier to know the difference in danger to us when we are on the run or when we have the enemy on the run.

The President believes he can best preserve those over there for the loved ones here by sending more aid. The present selective-draft law calls for men between 21 and 31. Our available man power between those ages is practically exhausted.

Mr. GORDON. Where do you get the proof of that statement, that the 10,700,000 men who have been registered are practically exhausted?

Mr. WELTY. I say our available man power between those ages is practically exhausted.

Mr. GORDON. I know that is what you said.

Mr. WELTY. That is, the available men in class 1.

Mr. GORDON. But there have been only 2,000,000 out of that 10,700,000 put in the Army.

Mr. WELTY. Oh, but there are some of these men between 21 and 31 who have children and dependents, and we are not going to take those before we take the boys of 18 and 19 who are without any dependents.

Mr. GORDON. Then do not say that our man power is exhausted.

Mr. WELTY. I said the available man power as they are classified between those ages is practically exhausted. The men are over there now. The brothers are there. And will the mother withhold her 18-year-old son if one or two between 21 and 31 of her sons are over there now calling for help?

Mr. GORDON. No; she will not withhold him if you draft him. Of course not. What makes married men available?

Mr. WELTY. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] did not believe in the selective service at all, and we can not blame him for being against it now. [Applause.] But those of us who recognized the murder of our American citizens by the Kaiser and said it was war upon the American people feel that we ought to support those boys whom we have sent over there.

Mr. GORDON. I agree we ought to support them, but we ought to support them with men and not with boys.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WELTY. I want to answer the gentleman from Ohio first. Do not treat these men of 18 as children. They are not going to take the boy who was exhibited here by my friend, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON]. I understand the 18-year old lad he exhibited wants to go, but he can not go because he is under weight. They are going to take stalwart men to fight the enemy over there. They are going to comb these 18 and 19 year men just as they have been combing the classes from 21 to 31. When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] thinks that the class between 21 and 31 has not received a sufficient combing, I want him to remember that on August 1 there were in the Army, from this class, 2,642,000 men, and that the August and September requests will add a half million to this number, making a total of approximately 3,142,000. Add to this those of this class who volunteered and you will have an Army of over three and one-quarter million men, chosen from 10,700,000. Of course, I admit, that there still remains seven and one-half million men, but you are making no deduction for the married man with a family and those who have aged dependents and that we must have a reserve army of workers at home.

One feature about this combing process has been overlooked by Members of Congress and that is, the country must not only supply our allies in food, but the friendly neutrals as well. How could Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Switzerland live without help from us? And then it is expected that we build ships to take the foodstuff and war supplies across the broad Atlantic. Some men must remain on the farm to raise our food and others must remain in the factory to manufacture munitions of war, and still others must build ships. I am inclined to think that the War Department has done a pretty good job of combing, for when you consider that about 30 per cent are physically defective, and the three and one-quarter million soldiers by October 1, you will have left less than four and one-quarter million out of the 10,700,000. Now I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. REAVIS. I will say to the gentleman, in order that my motives may not be impugned, that I voted for the selective-draft system. It is stated in the report from the Provost Marshal General, I think, that only 600,000 men can be obtained from the class from 35 to 45. Does the gentleman accept that statement as absolute?

Mr. WELTY. I do not, no; but I will say this much, that he has better opportunity to know, because of the machinery that he has, than the gentleman from Nebraska or I.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman recognizes the possibility of a mistake in that estimate?

Mr. WELTY. Oh, most assuredly.

Mr. REAVIS. Now, if there be a mistake, and we can get the army from that class, why not defer the boys until we find out whether we can get them from that class?

Mr. WELTY. I understand that we are going to do that, largely, and the 18-year-old boys will not go until this class is first exhausted.

Mr. REAVIS. They will do it with the McKenzie amendment; that is a cinch.

Mr. WELTY. Certainly, the War Department is in favor of that anyway, and it is useless for us to incorporate it into the law. They do not wish us to put into this law a hard and fast rule, so that they can not draft these boys if necessary and send them in support of those who are over there now.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we fail to comprehend the magnitude of this war when we withhold any man power or the resources of our country from its successful prosecution. A million five hundred thousand are over there now, and Gen. Pershing is calling for more man power. Are we going to sacrifice the men over there, or are we going to send their younger brothers and those from 31 to 45 to help them so that they might continue their offensive until the murderer now in the German saddle is unhorsed? Shall we permit this murderer to continue to trample down with his hoofs of fire these women and children, and crush all the sweet creations in the garden of God? I hope not. We can not cavil about our little differences here at home, for it is about time that we forget self and put our shoulders to the wheel until our banner is again crowned with a victorious and lasting peace. Ever since the July drive our boys have been engaged in a mighty conflict; and, thank God, they have won. But the battle has just commenced, even though we have them on the run.

Gentlemen, the endurance of these boys can not last always. We must send fresh troops to their aid as fast as ships can carry them, otherwise we lose thousands of those who are now fighting so gallantly. God forbid that I should withhold the hand attempting to crown these boys with victory.

Let us not be maudlin and sentimental about all this business of war. We can not win by words, but only the sword will bring victory against those who have faith in the sword. Mr. Chairman, prosperity, I am afraid, has brought us into a life of ease and comfort and has had a tendency to make us forget that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." The time is at hand when we must again be willing to make all the necessary sacrifice in order to take us to the standards set by our fathers. At the outbreak of the world war the country was found drifting and on its way to destruction.

As an evidence of this fact, let me remind you of only a few instances of the past few years, which now is history. In 1812 our fathers freely sacrificed their lives and fortunes to establish the freedom of the seas. Since that time all nations have recognized that right. But the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McLEMORE] introduced a resolution asking Congress to warn all American citizens to refrain from traveling on merchant ships armed for defense, as against the unlawful attacks of the murderous U-boat. Every American so riding on any of these ships was clearly within his right, as recognized by all nations, before the world war. But in the face of this right 142 gentlemen of the House held out encouragement to the German Government and thus surrendered the rights gained for us, in that War of 1812.

Again, when the President asked authority to arm American merchant ships, as against this monster murderer of the sea, the Sixty-fourth Congress withheld such authority. Is it any wonder that because of our weak policy the U-boat campaign increased in its fury in the mission of murdering our men, women, and children, and refused longer to respect our flag and the rights of American citizens under that flag? What was the result of this policy of surrendering American rights? There remained only one of two courses for us as a nation—destruction or war. On April 6, 1917, the die was cast by the American Congress, to save us as a nation; and, gentlemen, we will continue this war until the monster in the German saddle is unhorsed and brought to judgment. Our boys will not come home until God looks down on a world of peace again.

But even after the declaration of war and the passage of the selective-draft act, there were those in the House who insisted that we pursue a policy of self-destruction.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], on June 25, 1917, filed a bill (H. R. 5184) "to authorize the President to exempt from foreign military service * * * citizens of German and Austrian birth, * * * whose blood ties in the enemy country might discourage the supreme effort that is necessary for victory of our troops on foreign soil"—a further notice to the Kaiser that we were divided, even in the face of the declaration of war. Great God of our fathers! How dead was the soul of America when we must be judged in the light of the bolshevik spirit manifested by this evidence in the American Congress. Dead! In the language of Billy Sunday, we were "going to hell so fast that we could not be seen for the dust." I mention these matters not with pride, but a sense of shame, because it is an evidence that the American thought before the war was destined to lead in but one direction, which meant the destruction of 100,000,000 free people. But, thank God, this thought has not yet predominated in the minds of a majority of the American citizens. The Britten bill is an insult to every American of German and Austrian birth. My maternal ancestors came from Alsace, because they did not care longer to live in a land made the football of the German and French Governments, and if any one of my 17 nephews in the present draft would refuse to go to France to free their flesh and blood from bondage I would hang my head in shame. The Britten bill inferred that American citizens of German and Austrian origin were either cowards or it was an insult to every red-blooded American whose ancestors came from either of these countries.

These people should be first to return to strike the shackles from the wrists of their brethren—flesh of their flesh and blood of their blood. And, thank God, these sons are over there, "not discouraging the supreme effort that is necessary for the victory of our troops," as alleged in the Britten bill, but fighting as loyally and valiantly as any of them. And are they not being rewarded, when we have evidence that these men now in the ranks of our enemy quit their companies and regiments as soon as they can escape death from the guns of their officers—prisoners? Why, the allies are taking them so fast that they have been unable to count them. Who has championed the cause of freedom upon the floor of the House more valiantly than the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], an American born in Germany? All glory to him and others of German origin fighting the battles of freedom!

But to show you that the Britten bill is no credit to Americans of German and Austrian origin, let me cite you to but one act of Congress. After the declaration of war we had a large number from the central governments who had taken out only their first papers and who offered their services to the War Department, asking permission to be sent to France as an independent force, to fight shoulder to shoulder with our American boys, in order to free their own held in bondage. They did not ask for the pay or subsistence of an American soldier, but were willing to go at their own expense. The Secretary of War, however, refused to let them go, because they were not citizens of this country, and if captured would be punished as traitors. They then appeared before the Immigration Committee, of which I am a member, and Congress, in response to this request, passed the necessary legislation permitting them to become citizens upon entering the Army.

Under this law the Bureau of Naturalization has admitted to citizenship over 90,000 true and loyal soldiers now at the front and on their way to France. Are they cowards or is the Britten bill an insult to every American of German and Austrian origin? Or does it indicate a spirit in the land which, if fostered, would destroy us as a Nation? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] evidently did not know that every immigrant from Germany and Austria took an oath of allegiance before he became a citizen of this country, and in that oath he so took he not only renounced all allegiance to Germany and Austria but declared he would support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, and bear true faith and allegiance to the same. My grandfather took that oath, and I would not now be worthy of him if I were not true to the oath he took. Did this resolution intend to invite perjury on the part of these people or intend to convey that the oath was a mere matter of form and convenience? God forbid that this spirit should be permitted to live and thrive. What is the use of further attempting to please the Kaiser and his military staff by denying the requests of our President and the War Department? The German military autocracy has no more use for us than it has for our boys on the field of battle.

Another evidence of a twist in the thoughts of some people calling themselves Americans is shown by the conscientious objector, when he sings "My Country 'Tis of Thee," and in that hymn gives credit to God as being the author of their liberty; but when the country needs their support, they refuse to back up God when sacrifice of life and property is necessary to maintain their liberty.

We can not agree or make peace with anyone having murder in his heart and who believes that might makes right, nor with men who have forgotten God and believe that they can subjugate the world by practicing cruelties not known to the civilized world and commit atrocities unbelievable. Neither maudlin sentiments nor mushy words will win the war, but only men with guns can compel the surrender of the murderous spirit and crown democracy by bringing us into the sunlight of a victorious and lasting peace.

Sirs, will you then longer withhold your vote to grant the President all the man power necessary? Are you going to trust the War Department in the management of this war, or shall we further please the Kaiser and his military staff by hamstringing the President and denying the request of the War Department? Will we further foster and nurture the twist of our thoughts, which will only mean unrest, or shall we hit the ball as it crosses the plate and make a home run for the glory of the American Republic?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, there is a word or two further I would like to add to that which I said yesterday respecting the so-called McKenzie amendment.

I would like to direct the attention of the membership to the language this body used when it declared war against the Imperial Government of Germany:

The President is hereby authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on the war against the imperial German Government, and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

From the beginning of this Republic the military age has been between 18 and 45. The man power between those ages has always constituted the military force of this country.

Now that the President and the military authorities ask this Congress for the man power to enable them to speedily end the war, it is our duty, as I view it, to grant it without quibbling and without hesitation. There is here asked simply that we make good our declaration of war and put into the President's hands for instant use the entire military force of the United States. It may be, as the gentleman from Nebraska a moment ago suggested, that by combing the deferred classes additional men could be found, but to do that would take time, and the number secured, we know, would be inadequate. What this Government needs is an army now. We ought not to direct the military authorities to go into the highways and byways and try to find the man power needed to defeat Germany when here we have pointed out immediately about us the man power available for the task.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman has misstated what I said.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will yield if I can get more time.

Mr. REAVIS. But the gentleman has misstated me.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will yield to the gentleman if I have done the gentleman an injustice.

Mr. REAVIS. I do not know that it does me an injustice, but what I said was that the 600,000 the Provost Marshal General estimated we might get in classes between 31 and 45 might be a mistake, and in combing out the deferred classification there might be more in that class, and that might make this unnecessary.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The principle is the same; the securing of the 3,000,000 needed now by combing them out from the deferred classification ought not to be put upon the Government even if that number could be secured; we ought not to put upon our military authorities the arduous duty of a long process of finding, one here, one there, the men needed. The Chief of Staff has repeatedly said that there is not time to comb these deferred men for the man power needed right now. But it must not be admitted that the requisite number can be found by combing our industries. The only way to get the men needed is to adopt the age limits the bill fixes, and by all means that is the only way to get them now, when they are needed. There is no need to hesitate, no need to delay. The men needed are here and all we need is to pass this bill as drawn. In that we call into service the historic and time-honored American principle that the age for military service in this Republic is from 18 to 45. Let me affirm as strongly as I can that we ought to be taught and guided by the experience of others. We know the war when it first started was expected to last only about six months, and yet four years have passed, and it is not over yet.

Agreeable to carefully prepared plan, the central powers were prepared at the outset to throw their maximum strength in the conflict. At all times since their maximum potential strength has been the actual strength they have exerted. The allies, on the other hand, at no time until the present hour have had their maximum strength on the battle field. The allies have gone in by piecemeal and we know that until this day Germany has been the big military victor on the land. France, at first, had to fight pretty much alone. Russia, honeycombed with corruption, her arm paralyzed by treason, never more than exerted a spasmodic influence. Had Russia been Russia, the war would have ended within a year. Italy at first came in but partly, and Great Britain required time to build an army. Then Russia collapsed and gave up, disbanding the greatest army she had ever had.

Now, Italy and France and England are at their maximum strength, working in perfect unison, wielding their might together. If at once, instantly, America can bring her maximum strength to the aid of her allies, the war will soon end with the complete victory we demand. Let me again and again emphasize that the time to strike is now. The German laughs when we come successively to the attack; when we strike together with our full strength he will be smitten to the earth. Let us not delay an hour. Any one with vision at all must have known for months that which, since last December, I preached as strongly as I could from a hundred platforms in this country, that the European allies with their strength can hold Germany, but alone can not defeat her. It requires the strength of the United States at its full power to defeat Germany. I have urged since last fall that if we desire to win this war we must put into the field, at the earliest minute, 5,000,000 men. I confess frankly that at times I have been very impatient because our Government did not seem to see the need for America to strike with all her might. These plans should have been in view a year ago, but this is no time to quibble. The administration, now awake to what America must do, calls upon us to furnish the means that America may strike the supreme blow. We can not possibly withhold that which the President asks.

It is undoubtedly true that there is no man here in this presence that accurately forecasted, when the war was declared, the effort America must make to win the war. It would have been almost impossible for anyone to have had that vision. Perhaps some started our country into the war with practically no vision of how the war must be fought, but our vision is clear now. America's task is to furnish the man power at once necessary to crush the German armies. Let me repeat, our allies can hold but can not defeat our common enemy. Our blow must be the one that brings victory. The stronger the blow the quicker the victory.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Just one moment and then I will yield, because the gentleman so graciously withheld his objection to the extension of time. Last fall the allies were full of optimism. There was reason for it. Great Britain was pounding to break the line at three points and expected a great retreat to follow. France was pounding to break it at another important point, and the retreat of the Germans was confidently expected. It is a truth that history will reveal that during October of last year the British and French expected to break the Hindenburg line and hurl the Germans back out of Belgium and toward the Rhine. They had reason for their faith. The German Army was staggering on the western front from the blows hurled upon them. A few weeks more and the break would come.

Then Russia failed and the game had to be started all over again. Russia has ceased to be an ally. Russia will never again be our ally in this war. We must strike before Germany can use her and to prevent Germany from using her. The collapse of Russia released the western German Army, which, when speedily transferred to the west, gave Germany decided superiority there. Germany then struck to defeat our allies before we came. Those allies have, with heroic effort, stopped the German attack, are holding the Germans back, calling on us to hurry up and come. The magnificent work of our divisions already there tells our allies and Germany that the war will speedily end when the full might of America comes. At last the situation has arisen when the German advance has been stopped, but Germany has not been beaten. The Germans are retreating, and the time to strike is now. Keep them going toward Berlin, and give them no rest until they get there. To do that we must have an army of 4,000,000 men in France next spring. If the McKenzie amendment be adopted our military advisers say that can not be done. They tell us over and over again in the hearings that it will require all of the availables between 18 and 45 to enable the United States to carry out this program. When the allies found that Germany had been stopped and was being pressed back and their time to strike had come they called for the United States, that still had the great man power available, to rise up with her supreme strength and give them men to strike back Germany forever. Are we going to quibble and hesitate and stop now when this one great request comes to us? It is the request of your country, too, my friends, and answer it, I beg of you, as you have answered her calls heretofore.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. You have given money with a smile on your lips. You have made sacrifices you knew would heavily burden your people. Do not flinch when this last supreme test has come. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman agree with the War Department that there are only 600,000 men, 6 per cent of the men between the ages of 31 and 45, who are available or fit for military duty?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is not necessary that I agree or not agree. I do know this, that at its full amount the number is not sufficient and they need these two years of 18 and 19. We need all the men we can get and train. We can not wait to go through the slow process of combing our industries. We can not depend upon that method. We know it would not produce men enough, nor any of them in time. The needed man power is here at hand, it is magnificent material, too, and it is the part of wisdom to permit no delay.

I know it has been said to-day by an illustrious gentleman that if the enemy were at our gates, if his cannon were bombarding our cities, he would vote for these men, for all our men, to drive back the foe. I suggest that at this minute the foe is in possession of the land and homes of our allies; he is burning and destroying their cities, enslaving their people, and defaming their temples. Is it therefore not more in keeping with our high spirit and appreciation of our duty as an ally to send against the foe where he now is all the power an outraged nation can muster? Let me further suggest that if the policy he suggests be pursued it may be we will have the Hun at our gates, destroying our cities and murdering our people. The time to strike is now; the place to strike whenever the German Army can be found.

Some months ago it was hoped the war might be won in 1920. Very recent events give us the great hope that if America strikes at once with all her power the war can be ended next year. With this prospect, let every energy of our Nation be exerted to the utmost.

The victory we want is a complete one. Nothing can justify this war unless the German military idea, with all that it means, all that it entails, is crushed and forever destroyed. Then strike, America, with all your power, instantly, and keep on till our troops are in Berlin.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have sat patiently in this House the last two days and have listened to every word of debate. I have carefully read all of the printed hearings and evidence before the Military Committees of both House and Senate, and to my mind this whole question of draft age simmers itself down to one plain, simple proposition: Shall the American Congress, in the discharge of its constitutional duty "to raise and support armies," do now what no other nation except Germany up to this moment has done—draft into the service her 18-year-old boys and call them first to the battle field?

The War Department claim that to carry out this second draft program they must call the boys of 18, while those who favor the McKenzie amendment say that the boys of 18 should be called last and they should only be used as reserves in case of necessity.

I am pleased to know that the days of delay and senseless diplomacy and new peace aims and lulling to sleep the Nation by exaggerations and fairy tales have passed, and that the Secretary of War has at last come to the conclusion that we must prepare to put our whole energy into the war.

I am for this army of 5,000,000 men in France as soon as possible, but I do not believe it is necessary to make up that army from the tender, immature youth of this Republic.

I regret that certain Members of this House in the discussion of this question have seen fit to reflect upon the loyalty and patriotism of those who support the McKenzie amendment and who claim that any change in this bill as prepared by the War Department would hinder, delay, and defeat the administration in sending overseas the necessary army.

Certain Members of this House in the heat of debate have gone much further than this. They have declared, in substance, that, no matter what kind of war legislation the War Department desires, they will support and vote for it and oppose any amendments not pleasing to the Secretary of War; that they will surrender their judgment and their constitutional responsibility and become the mere machines, automatons, and rubber stamps of the War Department. I have, with you, witnessed the most humiliating spectacle of certain Members of the Congress of the United States, under the solemn responsibility of the Constitution, trembling and shivering in every breeze that comes from the White House and thinking only of the coming primaries and the "Ides of November." They hasten to protect themselves from any criticism by declaring that they are willing to surrender their weak and fallible judgment to the superior wisdom of the Secrertary of War, who in the past has given such valuable help and information to the Military Committees of this Congress in the matter of men and supplies and aeroplanes.

While I have made these suggestions, I do not mean them as a criticism of the Congress. Every Member of this House and of the Senate stand ready and willing to vote at once to raise and support an army of the size provided for in this bill. If the McKenzie amendment, so fair and just, is not accepted, I have no doubt that every vote will be for the bill on its final passage. The only question now is, Has the time come when the United States of America, a Nation of 110.000,000, the richest and most prosperous under the stars, must imitate Germany and now send her boys of 18 to the battle fields?

The War Department says that it is necessary to call those 18-year-old boys now to obtain the extra 2,000,000 men required by their program in this second draft. Is there such a necessity? We all agree that we must and ought to have an army overseas of the size provided by this new War Department program, and if we can not raise the necessary army between 19 and 45, why, then, we will go from the cradle to the grave if necessary to win this war, but in these days of constantly changing opinions in the War Department Congress should not lose its head, but should calmly and patiently examine the evidence in the light of all the facts. What is the evidence as to the necessity of calling the 18-year-old boys now?

The Secretary of War appeared before the Committees on Military Affairs of the House and Senate and outlined its new program, which is to call and send to the front at once sufficient men to make up, with those now there, an army of 5,000,000 men. According to his testimony, there are now in France 1,300,000 men. In the training camps of the United States there are 1,700,000, and there remains in the first draft in class 1 that have not yet been called 600,000, making in all 3,600,000 that were obtained by the first draft, and this leaves only 1,400,000 to be called from the second draft; and the question naturally arises in the mind of the ordinary man that if under the first draft of the men from 21 to 31 we obtained an army of 3,600,000 why would we not be able under the second draft of 31 to 45 obtain the balance of 1,400,000 men, which would be 2,700.000 less than we obtained under the first draft? I guess that we could. Mr. Baker guesses that we could not, and one guess is as good as another without registration and classification.

But if it is found necessary to go below the 21-year limit, you can easily find a million soldiers between the ages of 20 and 21 and another million between the ages of 19 and 20 who can claim no exemption. This is well known to the War Department. They know if they are obliged by law under this amendment to take the boys of 18 last that they will never be taken; but, somehow, the Secretary of War has set his mind on getting the 18-year-old boys first and saving the slacker, who is beyond 31, to save, as he says, the industries of the country. I stand for giving the boys of 18 the benefit of the doubt. Senator KIRBY expressed my view on this question when at the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs he said:

What disturbs me about the whole matter is this: We talk about democracy and prate about it all of the time, and my idea of it has been just the expression that you made use of a while ago, that everyone should stand equal before the law. Yet there is no equality at all, so far as the 18-year-old or the 19-year-old or the 20-year-old man is concerned. There is no equality whatever for him before this law. He never has had a chance to vote; he can not express himself; he has no one to represent him, except as it is done through other people. He has no voice in it at all. We are going to put the burden of the entire war, practically, from now on upon this class of men, and I do not believe it is fair to them. I am satisfied that he will make a good soldier and will fight valiantly, but it is not fair to the man himself and it is not fair to the country hereafter.

Oh, but Secretary Baker says that there is a necessity, an emergency, at the present time; that the War Department has not time to wait until it can be found how many soldiers can be obtained above 18 years. The Secretary further claims that if the boys of 18 are called now it will be less work for the War Department to make the draft, as the boys of 18 will not be exempted; they are not married and they have no dependents, and it is very easy to get them into the ranks at once. He might have added that they have no vote and perhaps no friends in the War Department.

Now, is it true that there is such a pressing necessity and supreme emergency that calls now to the service the 18-year-old boy and does not give us time to find out the truth? What has happened to change the opinion of the Secretary of War overnight? It is a new program, arranged by the department within the last few days, to obtain an army at once without any trouble and inconvenience on the part of the War Department and without spoiling the blanks, as it is testified that they have already prepared.

Gen. March, Chief of Staff of the War Department, in his testimony before the Military Committee of the Senate said:

The 80-division program which we are now embarking upon calls for men to be drafted in each month as follows: In August, 250,000; in September, 200,000; in October, 155,000; in November, 150,000; in December, 150,000; in January, 100,000; in February, 200,000; and from then on to the end of the year 300,000 men per month; and that program can be carried through.

This bill will pass both Houses and become a law during the present month. All between the ages of 18 and 45 will at once register. The boy of 18 must answer the same questions and pass the same examination as the man of 44. There are now enough men in class 1 under the first draft to meet all calls under the new program for August and September and still leave 150,000 men in class 1. If the War Department uses ordinary diligence, they can have the men above 18 classified and subject to call by October next. If this can be done, then there is no necessity and no emergency.

This claim of the War Department not being able to get the necessary army without taking the boys of 18 has been practically abandoned in this debate and now they claim that it is necessary to take the 18-year-old boy, because he makes the best soldier; that the older men are needed in the business and industries of the country; and that they must have this army made up of young men, and they have all changed their opinions about this within a few days.

The principal argument for taking the boys of 18 was made yesterday by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. He says in substance that it is necessary to take the boys of 18 now as they make the best soldiers, and they want the best army, and so forth. The New York Times of June 30, 1918, when the War Department proposed to raise the draft age but not to lower it, in an interview with the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] said:

Already defenders of the 21-year limit are becoming active. One of these is JULIUS KAHN, of California, one of the most influential Members of the House Committee on Military Affairs.

"I will advocate 21 to 45 years," he said the other day in Washington. "I do not think it advisable to lower the limit at this time. The European armies made the mistake of taking their young men first. The consequence was that as the war continued they had to turn more and more to older men; that is, men of less vigor. The soldiers who are doing the fighting in Europe to-day, with the exception of those in our own Army, are men of this type, in the main older men. I am opposed to exhausting our young men now. Let us save them for the final knockout blow, if they be needed for that."

"Is it not going against all the military authorities in drawing the line at 21?" Mr. KAHN was asked.

"Lieut. Gen. March, Chief of Staff," said Mr. KAHN, "when asked by our committee what was the best fighting age, answered 26."

During the short recess we have had I was down in Maine and met my people all over the State, and everywhere I put to them the question of the draft age, and everywhere the opinion was expressed that we ought not to take the 18-year-old boy unless there was an absolute necessity. This was especially true as to the fathers and mothers who have 18-year-old boys. Many of them have given to the service their sons of 21 and over, but when it comes to 18-year-old boys it is about the saddest sacrifice that has been demanded in this country.

Somehow it seems to me our people should not be called upon to make this awful sacrifice only a little over a year after we have entered into the war. Somehow the parents feel that when the boy gets out of school, has obtained his majority and is a man grown, he ought to stand for all the duties and responsibilities of citizenship, and they cheerfully give him to the country, but they believe that the boy of 18, the boy in the high school, the boy who has not attained his majority, is not a man grown and is still the baby of the family.

It is true that there is a class of 18-year-old boys who have enlisted in the Army and Navy of the United States. They are physically developed. They want to go to war; they long for adventure; they will make good soldiers and sailors; they will bring honor and glory to the flag. God bless them!

But it is also true that there is another class just as patriotic, just as brave, who do not long for war and adventure and the battle field, who are in school, who love their books and their studies, interested in learning the trades and professions and occupations of civil life. They are ready to sacrifice their ambitions, their future, their occupations and professions and all their opportunities in life to save the Nation and the cause of liberty and freedom, if it is necessary. But they can not understand why it is necessary to force their immature bodies into the service at this time—to deprive them of their education, their trade and profession and calling, and to demand of them this supreme sacrifice while those who are older and full grown are excused from the service. Parents of the 18-year-old boy are not satisfied with the statement of the Secretary of War that the supreme sacrifice now requires it and they call for the proof, and it can be easily settled and demonstrated by taking the older men first.

You will remember in sacred history that Jacob had many sons who had gone out from the home into the world, but he had Benjamin, the youngest at home, the hope and comfort of his old age. One day they brought to him the blood-stained garments of Joseph and he mourned his loss for many days. After this there came a famine in the land and there was corn only in Egypt, and the father sent the boys to get food, but he kept Benjamin at home. They soon returned to their father with the awful news that the king had made Simeon a prisoner, that he demanded Benjamin as a hostage before he would send food to Jacob. And they said to the father, "We can get the corn and the food only by taking from you Benjamin and delivering him to the king."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman requests that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HERSEY. And Jacob said, "Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away."

It was a terrible struggle for the old father, his only question was, can there be such a necessity as this? Then he says, "If it must be, take also your brother. If I am bereaved of my children, I am bereaved."

I know a family of two sons; one is dead on the battle fields of France. His blood-stained garments are in the possession of the father. There is another son of 18, the youngest child. He will be called under this bill among the first of this draft. The parents are not dependent for support upon him. He is single. He has no claims for exemption. He must go, and while it breaks the hearts of the father and mother they will give the boy, if necessary, to make up the Army that now demands this awful sacrifice, but they will never be satisfied with the bare statement of the Secretary of War that there is such a necessity.

Some one said to-day, in the course of the debate, that this was not a matter of sentiment, that this draft bill was a cold-blooded proposition, and that sentiment had no place in the making of the Army. Yes; it is indeed a cold-blooded proposition. I believe it. It certainly does not recognize anything but how best to get an army without sending to the front men who have attained their growth and are now making money out of the war. I venture to say that the taking of the 18-year-old youth will do more to disturb the business industries and homes of the country than the drafting of any other class or age.

What about the schools and colleges and industries of the country? Dr. Mann, of the War Department, in his testimony before the Senate committee, said:

As long as it was 21 years of age, most of the boys could get their college education and then go into active service, but under the 18-year proposal, if the age group of 18 is called right away, it will take practically every boy out of college, unless he is physically disqualified.

We all hope, O how earnestly, for the dawning of the day when this great world war will end. Peace will come like a benediction to bless this blood-drenched earth, but O the weary, weary years that may come before the boys come back. Some day the remnant, no one can say how small, will come straggling home. We will welcome them under arches of flowers and with tears of joy. They will come to us then not boys but broken men, broken in health, wrecked in the flower of their youth. They will never again enter the college walls; they will never again man the industries of the Nation; they will never again take up the labor that calls for brawn and brains. America must, in the new war for trade, if she keeps her place among the nations of the earth, save, protect, and conserve her fresh young men and save them from the awful vortex of war. She must preserve and conserve her young men in her trades, industries, schools, and colleges if this Nation shall survive the wrecks of time.

The Utica (N. Y.) Press a few days ago said editorially:

There will be more need for educated and trained young men in the years to come than ever before. It follows, then, that until there is imperative necessity the younger men should be permitted to remain in the schools, the colleges, the shops, and factories where they are acquiring the education and the skill which will be so valuable to them afterwards. Raising the limit from 31 to 36 years will bring in hundreds of thousands now exempt who will be capable of military service and meet all the requirements in sight now and for some time to come.

President Wilson, on the 9th day of this month, before the War Department was stricken with hysteria, wrote a letter to Secretary Lane, in which he said:

I am pleased to know that despite the unusual burdens imposed upon our people by the war they have maintained their schools and other agencies of education so nearly at their normal efficiency. That this should be continued throughout the war and that, in so far as the draft law will permit, there should be no falling off in attendance in elementary schools, high schools, or colleges is a matter of the very greatest importance, affecting both our strength in war and our national welfare and efficiency when the war is over.

So long as the war continues there will be constant need of very large numbers of men and women of the highest and most thorough training for war service in many lines. After the war there will be urgent need not only for trained leadership in all lines of industrial, commercial, social, and civic life but for a very high average of intelligence and preparation on the part of all the people.

Whatever inconvenience it may make to the War Department, how much it may spoil blanks already prepared, how much more work it may be necessary to do in classification, God help us to take a little more time, if necessary, to conserve, protect, educate, and save the youth of America, the hope of the Nation, the hope of the world.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to consume much time. I regret that certain statements or remarks have been made on the floor of the House to-day that might be construed as questioning the honesty of purpose or patriotism of certain Members.

There is no reason to question the patriotism or the so-called "Americanism" of any Member, whether he is for or against this amendment. I take it that every Member of Congress is willing and anxious that the military authorities shall have all the men and money they may need to prosecute this war and bring it to a speedy and successful conclusion. This Congress has voted money by the billions of dollars and men by the millions and turned them all over to the President and military authorities, without stint or reserve, for the prosecution of the war. We have given powers to the President of the United States such as no civilized nation on earth has ever given to one man. When it comes to the method of securing and furnishing either money or men we, the Members of this House, should give our best thought and judgment and vote accordingly. I am sorry that the self-appointed and self-named Security League has assailed the Americanism of all but 47 Members of this House. It seems I am not one of the 47, because I happened to differ with their ideas on one of the eight measures selected by them. Permit me to say that I always have, do now, and always shall assert my right as an American citizen and as a Member of this House [applause], regardless of the Security or any other league or anyone else. I differed with the administration when the so-called "quota" bill was under consideration and supported Gov. SHALLENBERGER'S proposed amendment to the law. I believed then, and I believe now, that the quota of men to be furnished by each State and district should be based on the number fit for military duty and not on the number in class 1, thereby removing from the local boards the temptation of placing as few as possible in class 1. It is a fact, and we know it, that the boards did not use the same judgment throughout the country, some boards placing as high as 70 per cent in class 1 and others less than 10 per cent, where the population and conditions seemed to be alike.

Now, as to the matter of furnishing additional men for the Army, the program, as I understand it, is that the military authorities want 4,000,000 men on the other side by next June and a million men in training in the United States. There is not a man on the floor of this House who is not willing they should have them. We want to win this war and win it quickly, and if it takes 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 or 10,000,000 they shall have them; but where to get these men is the question we are debating. Must we take boys of 18 years of age to get 5,000,000 men now? Now, gentlemen, if I mistake not, Gen. Crowder says that there are 762,000 men registered in this country citizens of other friendly nations. We passed a bill some time ago that will make those men available for military service, but that bill is held up at the other end of the Capitol, but can be passed by the Senate just as quickly as this bill can be passed. If the Senate will pass that bill—and they will if the administration wants it passed—we have, according to the figures of Gen. Crowder, 762,000 available men between the ages of 21 and 31.

In addition to that, if I am correctly informed, there are still remaining registered and in class 1 about 600,000 men. In addition to this, according to the figures furnished or given by the authorities, the registration of men between 32 and 45 will furnish 600,000 more class 1 men. Now, you have got 1,962,000 men without going below the age of 21. On the 24th day of August we will register probably 200,000 more who have attained the age of 21, making a total of 2,162,000 men, not one of which is under 21 years old. If we wish to consider the younger men, we find, according to the estimate given by the same authority, 1,121,000 men available between the ages of 19 and 20.

Now, if you will add those four items together, you will have the sum of 3,283,000 men. You have now over 3,000,000 men in the service, and that will give you an Army of over 6,000,000 men, while the program only calls for 5,000,000 men, and you will not have touched one boy of the age of 18. In fact, to raise an army of 5,000,000 for home and abroad you need not take, as I have demonstrated with figures furnished by the military authorities themselves, one single man under 21 years old, and by the time the 2,000,000 to which I have referred have been called and trained six or nine months will have passed, and we will have from 600,000 to 700,000 more registered in class 1 all over 21 years old. So that I contend there is absolutely no reason why we should call a boy under 21 years to active service unless the emergency should arise which does not now seem to exist. I feel that it is not now necessary to call boys of 20 or 19 years, much less those of 18 years of age. If they choose to enlist, as many thousands have and many more thousands no doubt will, all well and good; but the present demands of the Government can be met by men 21 years of age. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SWIFT] is recognized.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I was very much impressed yesterday with that portion of the argument presented by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] wherein he stated that the military disasters suffered by our allies were caused by the failure to summon their potential resources before the Russian debacle.

While not versed in military strategy, I believe it is the verdict of history that all great wars have been won by a great concentration of man power at a given point and at a given time. And, as the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] said, the United States proposes to profit by the mistakes of its cobelligerents. For that reason I am heartily in sympathy with the proposition to marshal our man power in the manner requested by the Secrertary of War, the Chief of Staff, and the Provost Marshal General.

Yesterday afternoon, after the gentleman from California closed his speech, the Sixty-third Regiment, from the City of the Golden Gate, marched by this historic Capitol to the tune of martial music, with the colors of that regiment flying and those boys singing these words:

Over the line, across the Rhine,
Uncle Sam will show the way.

The sentiment contained in those simple words should inspire every Member of Congress with high courage to respond to the call of his Government. The question the Congress must decide once more is whether or not we will lay aside sentiment and yield to the judgment of our military authorities in the prosecution of the war.

Figures of the ages of volunteers in the Civil War have been quoted in this debate which have been shown to be erroneous on numerous occasions. I shall now submit the statistics relating to Civil War enlistments collected by the United States Sanitary Commission in 1869.

They show that out of total enlistments of 1,050,000 men 194,000 were between the ages of 18 and 21 and 199,000 between the ages of 32 and 45. These figures demonstrate that if we deny the request presented to us for determination in the pending bill we will materially cripple the military power of this Government in its efforts to double our fighting forces on the western front. I do not believe that there is any gentleman in this body who desires to assume that responsibility.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The time for debate has expired. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask, in order that there may be no uncertainty about the meaning of this amendment, that in line 1, page 3 of the printed bill, after the word "registration," the words "in class one" be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in a manner which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modification of the McKenzie amendment: Page 3, line 1, after the word "registration," insert the words "in class one."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACKMON. I have an amendment to offer to line 2, on page 2, striking out the word "eighteen" and inserting "twenty-one." Would not that be in order at this time as a perfecting amendment?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota rise?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that his suggested amendment does not accomplish the purpose he has in view. I would like to say, if he will notice the language in lines 22 and 23, on page 2, it is this:

And registrants of the age of 18 years and not over 19 years shall be designated the 18 class and shall be last called for service.

Now, he should insert in there—

Shall be deferred until after all others in class 1 have been called.

Then it reaches that point, and that is all he needs to do.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the words "in class 1" be inserted after the word "registrants," in line 24, page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the proposed modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 24, after the word "registrants" insert the words "in class 1."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois should now ask unanimous consent to withdraw his former modification.

Mr. McKENZIE. I make that request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to withdraw the first modification reported at the desk. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to make a statement to the committee. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] has submitted to the Chair a parliamentary inquiry, coupled with the information that he is prepared to offer and desires to offer an amendment to line 2, page 2 of the bill, striking out "18" and inserting "21." He then submits the parliamentary inquiry as to whether or not that amendment ought not first be voted upon, inasmuch as the so-called McKenzie, or committee, amendment deals with those of 18 years of age and up to 21. The Chair recognizes the rule not only of this House but also of the Senate to be that committee amendments always have preference, and that the ordinary order would be to perfect the McKenzie, or committee, amendment, if there are any amendments offered to it—and I believe there is in this case one—and then have the committee vote on the McKenzie, or committee, amendment first. But the Chair feels that there is a great deal of force in the suggestion made in the parliamentary inquiry submitted by the gentleman from Alabama. If his amendment should prevail, the Chair feels that he must take notice of the fact that the McKenzie amendment or the committee amendment would be wholly unnecessary, and on account of that the Chair is very much inclined, unless the committee disagrees with him, to recognize the gentleman from Alabama to offer his amendment and let the committee vote on that proposition first. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, would the same argument apply to the amendment that I desire to offer, to change the word "eighteen" to "nineteen"?

The CHAIRMAN. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would be recognized to offer it?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Unless the committee feels that the Chair ought not to take that procedure, the Clerk will report the Blackmon amendment first.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACKMON: Amend, line 2, page 2, by striking out "eighteen" and inserting "twenty-one."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer as a substitute for that an amendment to strike out the word "eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "nineteen."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment as a substitute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I offer that as an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Strike out the word "eighteen," in line 2, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the word "nineteen."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. GORDON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 90, noes 172.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. BLACKMON. A division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 194.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the Lunn amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, in the two amendments that I made I inserted the words "so far as practicable" on page 2, line 24, after the word "shall," and on page 3, line 1. I ask unanimous consent to insert the same phrase on page 2, line 20, after the word "shall."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment to the committee amendment in the manner to be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modification of the Lunn amendment: Page 2, line 20, after the word "shall," insert the words "so far as practicable," and on the same page, line 24, after the word "and," insert the words "so far as practicable," and on page 3, line 1, after the word "shall," insert the words "so far as practicable."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the Lunn amendment to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Lunn amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment, the so-called McKenzie amendment, as modified.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. McKENZIE. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 120, noes 167.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a substitute for section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers a substitute for section 1, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sustitute offered by Mr. McKEOWN for section 1:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the second sentence of section 2 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917, be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"'Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens and male persons residing in the United States, not alien enemies, who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 18 and 45, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act: Provided, That the President may draft such persons liable to military service in such sequence of ages and at such time or times as he may prescribe: Provided, however, That registrants who on the date fixed by the President for registration are of the age of 18 years and not over 20 years may be called under the provisions of this act shall, wherever practical, be assigned to educational institutions for military training under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and he is authorized to contract with such educational institutions for subsistence, quarters, and military and academic instructions of such soldiers.'"

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma in the nature of a substitute for section 1.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. McKEOWN was rejected.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, to be inserted as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment in the nature of a new section.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Before that is offered I have an amendment to strike out the word "forty-five" and insert "fifty." Should not the vote be taken on that before proceeding to a new section?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment to section 1, to perfect the section, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Page 2, line 2, after the word "and," strike out "forty-five" and insert "fifty."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington and Mr. NORTON) there were—ayes 118, noes 168.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington demands tellers.

Tellers were refused, not a sufficient number seconding the demand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCULLOCH: After section 1 add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. No alien who is a citizen or subject of any of the countries cobelligerent with the United States in the present war shall, unless contrary to existing treaties, be granted exemption from military service or placed in deferred classification under the provisions of this act or under any rule or regulation to be issued by authority granted under the provisions of this act solely on account of alienage; and

"Provided further, That the War Department shall, immediately after the passage of this act, reclassify all aliens heretofore registered who are citizens or subjects of any of the countries cobelligerent with the United States in the present war and who have been exempted or placed in deferred classification on account of alienage, and said aliens shall be immediately called for service unless such action would be contrary to existing treaties.

"Provided further, That the act of May 18, 1917, is hereby amended accordingly."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves a point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH] offers this as a new section. Now, there is already a section 2 in the bill, which has not been considered.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order that the time for submitting this amendment has passed. The committee reported an amendment of the same general character, included in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. That was in lines 7 to 17, which has been acted upon and stricken out. The Chair will notice that it is of the same character as the amendment now submitted by the gentleman from Ohio. I think the gentleman should have offered his amendment at that time, because the House was considering that subject matter, and the gentleman failed to avail himself of his rights. After the House has considered the subject matter once, if a Member can offer the same proposition as a separate section, we can be held here interminably in the consideration of legislation. It has often been held by the Chairmen of the House that when considering any legislation in Committee of the Whole, after the legislation has once been considered, it will not be in order to revert back to matters already considered. I remember a ruling by the late Vice President Sherman, one of the best parliamentarians that ever presided over the House, when an amendment was offered to an appropriation bill the subject matter of which had been previously considered, the Chair held that if we were to take up matters that had been passed upon by the committee, there would be no end to the consideration of the bill and we would be held here interminably before we could come to a conclusion on the bill. The time for the gentleman to have offered his amendment was when we were considering the amendment to strike out the paragraph then under consideration. Having failed to do so he is too late to offer it as a separate section.

Mr. DENT. I also make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. On which side?

Mr. TOWNER. I am opposed to the point of order made by both the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Alabama. In the first place, it is germane because it is an amendment to section 1 of this bill which in its original form before it was amended contained the same subject matter, the same references that are contained in this amendment. It is proper also to consider it as a separate section, and it is proper also to consider it now. It would have been improper to have considered it before because there was an amendment to the original section, and by preference the one who offered the amendment may desire to offer it as a new section, and both would properly come at this time, so there is no real ground for the objection raised by either the gentleman from Wisconsin or the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw any point of order as far as I am concerned.

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before I withdraw the point of order, this being offered as a new section to the bill, will it be open to discussion?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it would.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to the House voting on it. [Cries of "Vote! Vote!"]

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I do not desire to discuss the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH].

The question was taken; and on a division there were—129 ayes and 74 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, between lines 2 and 3, as a new section insert the following: "Upon the approval of the State of which any soldier in the military service of the United States or any honorably discharged soldier from such service is a resident, such soldier or honorably discharged soldier shall not be denied the right of suffrage by reason of age."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman having reserved the point of order, is the amendment debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment is debatable.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I will make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order on the ground that it is not germane.

Mr. WALSH. And furthermore it would be unconstitutional.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It would not be unconstitutional, because it expressly says that it is subject to State control.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the provision of section 4 of said act, "persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency," be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"Persons engaged in occupations or employments found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency."

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by adding after the word "emergency," line 12, page 3, the following: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed to exempt from draft into the Army under this act or under any act heretofore passed the officers, legislative and executive, of the United States or of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and section 4 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917, be so amended as to eliminate after the words 'That the Vice President of the United States' the words 'the officers, legislative and executive, of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia.'"

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, the recent act of May 18, 1917, exempted the legislative and executive officers of the Federal Government and of the different State governments. This is to repeal that provision. If the man power of this country has been so exhausted that we are bound to call upon the 18-year-old boys to fight this war, I do not see why this great horde of officers of the States and of the Federal Government should be exempted specifically.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Would the gentleman include in his amendment the proposition to take away from the heads of the departments the authority to ask for exemptions of their employees also? They have exempted thousands and thousands here in Washington.

Mr. GREGG. I did not intend to deal with that. This does not make anybody subject to the draft. It simply says that certain men shall not be specifically exempted. I do not think while we are here imposing obligations upon the 18, 19, and 20 year old boys of America that we have any right to exempt ourselves from the same burden that we impose upon others. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. Let us be men; let us be willing to take our places in the ranks. If you want to extend the time to an age which will include me, I am ready to vote for it, but let us be men. Let us not permit this great horde of State and Federal officers to be specifically exempted when the 18 and 19 year old boys have got to go and fight. If there is any manhood in you, gentlemen, you ought to vote not to exempt yourselves. If there is any bravery in any of you, you will go to the front instead of sending the 18-year-old boy. [Applause.] Let us adopt this amendment; let us tell the world that while we have taken the boys we are willing to go ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I desire to offer in the way of a new section.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this section.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to perfect the text of section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentlemen for that purpose later.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to this section, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas: Page 3, line 9, after the word "in," insert the words "agriculture and other," so that the line as amended will read:

"Persons engaged in agriculture and other occupations or employments found to be necessary," etc.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the demand comes too late. Was the gentleman on his feet, demanding a division?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No; I was not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey was in time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey informed the Chair that he was not upon his feet when he asked for a division.

Mr. STAFFORD. But he immediately rose and addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 12, after the word "emergency," strike out the period and insert a comma, and add the following: "and no person employed in any of the executive departments of the Government, Government establishments, boards, or commissions shall be exempt by reason of such employment from military duty under the provisions of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. No; let us have a vote.

Mr. WALSH. Then I demand the floor in my own right.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

Mr. WALSH. I have been recognized. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is evidently intended to put into the service those employees in the civil branch of the Government for whose deferred classification or exemption requests have been filed by the heads of the department, but if you will follow the wording of that amendment it does not accomplish what the gentleman desires, because it does not take away from the heads of the departments the right to ask for deferred classification or exemption in the future for employees who may be later put in those places and the gentleman's amendment is not worded in a manner in which it will take this exemption privilege away from the heads of those departments.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask that the amendment may be again reported, so that we may understand intelligently what it is?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to modify that by adding the words "now or hereafter employed."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment, page 3, line 12, after the word "emergency," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "and no person employed in any of the executive departments of the Government, Government establishments, boards, or commissions now or hereafter shall be exempt by reason of such employment from military duty under the provisions of this act."

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois by inserting after the word "exempt" the words "or given deferred classification."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting after the word "exempt" the words "or given deferred classification," so that as amended the amendment will read, "and no person employed in any of the executive departments of the Government, Government establishments, boards, or commissions now or hereafter shall be exempt or given deferred classification by reason of such employment from military duty under the provisions of this act.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. You will absolutely destroy the administrative branch of the Government if you undertake to say that they shall not have anybody between 18 and 45 years in the deferred classes. It seems to me that after the debate that has gone on here for two days that you want to do what the department wants you to do. You are going to pass the bill that the department has prepared, and that you ought not at this late day undertake to destroy the bill and make it a farce; and I hope that this amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Does that catch shipyard employees—those employed in the offices of the shipyards?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think we ought to do that which is absurd, ridiculous, and destructive also at the same time. If you intend to defeat the bill, vote against it in the right way, but do not load it down with a lot of impractical, impossible, absurd, and ridiculous provisions. Why, the staff service of the Army is just as necessary as the field service. We can not wage war without somebody to do the necessary departmental work. One is just as necessary as the other. Now, what is proposed will destroy the Shipping Board, the Emergency Fleet Corporation; you are going to destroy some of the most vital military services necessary to be performed by providing that the department officials shall have a no deferred classification, that they shall not have an exemption from field duty. There are two sorts of service. One is just as essential as the other. Look at the resolutions introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, himself who offers this amendment. Look at the replies which have been handed in. The Secretary of the Navy in reply shows over 7,000 who are in essential but not in active naval service. This amendment is ridiculous and absurd and will be a discredit to the House if adopted, as well as a distinct hindrance in executing necessary war plans. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. VARE. I want to ask the ranking member of the committee on the Republican side——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has been recognized.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I crave the cessation of conversation and the attention of the committee.

So far as I know I am not interested in any employee connected with any of these departments or commissions covered by this amendment. Let us see if I understand what the amendment means. There is a great army of clerks employed.

Take the accounting officers, take the clerks that have been in the departments for years, and many of them are invaluable, hundreds of them, I have no doubt, as invaluable as is the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations of the House. Now, here is a proposition, as I understand the amendment, that they shall be subject to the draft—subject to call into the military service—although I have no doubt that many of them are exempted, if it is necessary that they be exempted, by Executive order. This, if enacted into law, would do away with the Executive order. If it was the law to-day, I have not any hesitation, as I understand the public business, in saying that it would practically bring chaos to the various executive departments. [Applause.]

This is a great body. We are fond of calling ourselves the greatest legislative body on earth. It is late in the day. This amendment ought really to receive serious consideration; and if we are hungry or tired or hot let us adjourn and take a little time in which to cool. For a long time I have been a Member of the House of Representatives. I have great pride in the service, and I have great respect for this body. Let us not make ourselves ridiculous and bring ridicule upon ourselves throughout the country and throughout the world by agreeing to this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not want anyone here to say that I have any desire to bring ridicule upon this body. My colleague has no more respect for this body than I have; not a bit. I am as patriotic as he is.

Mr. CANNON. I do not question that.

Mr. MADDEN. I am as patriotic as any man here. I believe every man, whether he is employed in a Government office or not, ought to take the same responsibility in the present emergency that every man in every household in the land is compelled to take. [Applause.] The adoption of this amendment would be neither absurd nor ridiculous. Its consideration is a proper matter for the House. It is presented in good faith. It provides that no person, simply because he is employed in an executive branch of the Government of the United States, shall, as the result of that employment, be exempted from military service under this act. Is that absurd?

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I have only a minute. Is it absurd to say that because some man has sufficient influence to get on the Government pay roll he ought to be exempted from military duty?

Mr. VARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not yield. We already have the example of the heads of these executive branches of the Government asking for the exemption of their pets, their employees. The Secretary of Agriculture requested and received exemption or deferred classification for 2,130 men on his pay roll.

The Secretary of the Navy, in the offices here in Washington alone, received at his own request deferred classification for about 560 men. Other branches of the Government, all these departments, have hidden away behind the bullet-proof line men whose people have had sufficient influence to get them on the Government pay roll while my boy and your boys and the boys of the widows of America are over in France on the battle line. [Applause.] There is no reason why they should not be put on the same plane with every other American. They will be entitled to their exemptions for family obligations, for physical defects, and for other reasons that men are entitled to exemption for. But under no circumstances should the mere fact that they are on the Government pay roll entitle the President of the United States or any other man to exempt them from their responsibility under the Military Establishment. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. TEMPLE rose. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had agreed to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] is a member of the committee, and the Chair therefore recognizes him.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am in position to oppose this amendment without the least feeling of selfishness, for I have only one constituent in the Government service, as shown by the reports of the heads of the several departments, whose call has been deferred, and I do not know him personally, or any of his people. So not from any selfish motive, but for the good of this bill and for the good of the Government I think it is time that we begin to get a little calm. You are preparing to load this bill with amendments that will make it absolutely absurd. Now, you gentlemen who have stood here and asked for protection of industry, who have asked that the War Department be given authority to draft the young men of 18, 19, and 20 before drafting the older men, lest their failure to do so might interfere with the industries of the country, should think seriously upon this proposition. The great industry in this country at this time is the work of the executive departments that are conducting the affairs of this war. I challenge you to show a single man in a private industry in this country whose services are as valuable or as indispensable to that industry as those of the valuable men, the trained men, in the executive departments of the Government.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will my friend yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Let me finish this thought. What would the War Department do should its trained men, who are in charge of the military records, be drafted to the field or line duty?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FIELDS. In just a moment I will yield. You have repeatedly said here that you do not want to hamstring the War Department. I will ask you this question, and then I shall be through: Would the adoption of this amendment hamstring the War Department?

Mr. MADDEN. It would not.

Mr. FIELDS. Of course it would. You could hit no harder blow to the War Department than by adopting this amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, the House has been working here for such a long period of time—ever since 11 o'clock in the morning—that notwithstanding the tentative promise that I made to try to finish this bill to-night, I see no chance to do it without keeping the House here an unnecessarily long time. I therefore move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

A division was demanded by Mr. MADDEN, Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, and Mr. KNUTSON.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 177, noes 81.

The CHAIRMAN. On this vote the ayes are 177 and the noes are 81, and the committee determines to rise.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12731) amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 168. Joint resolution tendering public acknowledgment of gratitude to the Army and Navy of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BOOHER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, from August 19, 1918, on account of illness in his family.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, August 24, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SULZER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12210) to amend the act of May 14, 1898, as amended by the act of March 3, 1903, entitled "An act to extend the homestead laws and to regulate the sale and entry of public lands along the shore of navigable waters in Alaska," reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 760), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KNUTSON: A bill (H. R. 12808) prohibiting the payment of fees to claim agents and attorneys for services or alleged services in recovering pay or allowances of persons in the Army or Navy, or in the claims of beneficiaries of such persons; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CARY: Resolution (H. Res. 425) requesting the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to inform the House of Representatives by what authority the Washington, Baltimore & Annapolis Electric Railroad Co. exercises corporate franchises in said District, etc.; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. RAMSEYER: A bill (H. R. 12809) granting an increase of pension to Smith J. Dutton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12810) granting an increase of pension to William H. McKay; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. IGOE: A bill (H. R. 12811) granting a pension to Lee Nolte; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BACHARACH: Petition of sundry citizens of Port Republic, N. J., in re war-time prohibition; also, petition of sundry citizens of Burlington County, N. J., protesting against the passage of war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CARY: Petition of James C. Reed, president of the National Commercial Teachers' Federation, protesting against the proposed tax on the tuition fees of business schools; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of sundry business firms, against prohibition as applied to light wines and beer; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DALE of New York: Memorial of the New York State Hotel Association, against prohibition amendment to the emergency agricultural appropriation bill; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, Petition of farmers of Kendall County, Ill., for bone-dry war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GRIEST: Resolution adopted by the Covenant United Brethren Church, of Lancaster, Pa., urging the enactment of war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of R. W. Schreiner, H. F. Butzer, B. Franklin Futer, J. B Flory, D. W. Ranck, and J. D. Rider, all of Lancaster, Pa., protesting against the passage of a discriminatory war tax on automobiles; also, a communication from Morris D. Neuman & Co., Philadelphia, Pa., recommending a substitute for the schedule proposed by the Ways and Means Committee as rates of revenue taxes on cigars; to the Committee on Ways Means.

By Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania: Petition of citizens of Ulysses, Potter County, Pa., protesting against the lowering of the draft age below 21 years; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota: Petition of J. C. Wilson and 48 other residents of Hannaford, N. Dak., urging war-time prohibition; also, a resolution of the same import from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of North Dakota; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 24, 1918.

(Legislative day of Thursday, August 22, 1918.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon.

PETITIONS.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Eleventh Suffolk Representative District of Massachusetts, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Wareham, and of sundry citizens of Boston, Brockton, Granville, Somerville, Melrose, Gloucester, Framingham, Everett, Richmond, Leyden, Whitman, Lynn, Williamsburg, Littleton, and Saugus, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FERNALD presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Carpenters' State Council, of Jackson; memorials of Carpenters' Local Union, No. 1233, of Detroit; of the Federation of Labor of Detroit; and of local union, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, of Midland, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed "work-or-fight" amendment to the man-power bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COLT presented a petition of the congregation of the Methodist Church of Bristol, R. I., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

CHANGES IN DRAFT AGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4856) to amend sections 2, 4, and 5 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I want to make a brief statement that is rather in the nature of a personal explanation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Harding	New	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Henderson	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Nugent	Smoot
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Sterling
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Penrose	Sutherland
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Thomas
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Townsend
Curtis	Kellogg	Robinson	Trammell
Dillingham	Kendrick	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Fall	Kenyon	Shafroth	Walsh
Fernald	Kirby	Sheppard	Watson
France	Lodge	Sherman	Wilfley
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Shields	Wolcott
Gerry	McKellar	Simmons
Gore	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Guion	Martin	Smith, Ga.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum of the Senate present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in the short address I delivered the other day in speaking of sending the young men of the country over to Europe and brigading them with our allies I made this statement:

> We sent them over so slowly at first—and I am not criticizing anybody for it, but I am just calling attention to the fact—that we did not have units large enough to have them fight under our own officers and our own flag, but we brigaded them with our allies.
> It was like associating the living with the dead, this taking of these young men, with all the life and enthusiasm that America can give, and brigading them with men who had been fighting for four long, tedious years. They could not, in the very nature of the case, have had that vigor and enthusiasm which they would have had if they had been permitted to fight under American officers and under the American flag.

My attention has just been called to an editorial in the New York Times of this morning criticizing that statement. I infer from the article that the writer of it thought I intended by that statement to convey the idea that the allies were either not doing their part of the fighting or were not in condition to fight. I did not mean any such thing as that.

Mr. President, no man who knows the history of this war and the indomitable courage our allies have displayed, and are displaying, and the magnificent fight they have made for four long years, and are making at this very moment, could have found it in his heart to suggest such an idea. I am sure those who heard me did not get that impression, nor will those who will take the trouble to read my address. If others did, I am sorry, indeed, that my language was so unguarded as to convey such an idea, and I am taking advantage of this first opportunity to correct it. It was my purpose to suggest that it was, in my opinion, not wise to brigade the fresh soldiers from America with the war-worn veterans of our allies. That was all I intended to say. I only meant to draw a parallel between the active, vigorous men in the prime of life who had not done any fighting of any kind and eager to get into the fray being associated with the weary and worn soldiers of our allies who had been engaged in bitter struggle for four long years. I did not intend to challenge, nor can any man, friend or foe, challenge the courage, the patriotism, and fighting qualities of our allies. I do think, individually and collectively, that the units of our Army ought to be commanded by American officers and under our own flag, subject, of course, to the supreme command which, in my opinion, has been wisely established with that distinguished and gallant French soldier and strategist, Gen. Foch, at the head.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have been wanting to ask a Member of the Committee on Military Affairs or a Member of the Committee on Naval Affairs a little question, the answer to which might enlighten the country to a considerable extent.

We have heard on the Senate floor very often from members of the committee and from other Members the wonderful achievements of our Navy and what we have built it up to be. No one doubts the ability of our commanders of ships to accomplish good results if you give them the opportunity. But I can not help calling the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that a single submarine appears in our waters, captures a little trawler, puts 16 German sailors on board that trawler, puts a small gun or two on that trawler, and for more than a week has been destroying fleet after fleet of our fishing smacks. Where is there an end? Where are these swift U-boat chasers that we have been hearing about? Who is responsible for the fact that an American fishing trawler has been captured by a U-boat and converted into a man-of-war in our very harbors, and is traveling up and down the Atlantic coast without being molested in the slightest degree?

My information is that the speed of a trawler is about 8 to 12 knots per hour. It can not go under the water and hide itself. It is where it can easily be found. We can excuse our failure to capture the U-boat, because we can not find it, we can not see it, it does its work in the dark and under the sea, but here is a slow-moving trawler that is taking whole fleets of fishing vessels off the ocean under our very eyes.

I wish some member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the committee who have been telling us about the wonderful efficiency of our Navy, would enlighten us and explain to us why such a thing is possible. I think the people ought to know why it is. Of course, we know a great portion of our Navy is out at sea, but why are we unable with this mighty Navy to capture a trawler whose speed is 10 knots per hour?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I think, as a minority member of the Naval Committee, I can in part answer the Senator's inquiry. It is easily demonstrated that the Secretary of the Navy lost at least three months, and very likely much more time, before he got started on his naval preparedness. This fleet of destroyers, which ought to have been gotten ready long before they were, are now being built, and very few of them have been turned out.

In my opinion, this is due very largely to the procrastination of the Secretary of the Navy, who for some reason or other was unable to reach conclusions or decisions about the matters submitted to him. At least 150 days elapsed before even many of the preliminary contracts were awarded.

Some people in close touch with the department, assuming that the war has been costing this country and the allies some $100,000,000 a day, estimate that some $15,000,000,000 or more have been expended merely to maintain a situation until the Navy Department could come to some conclusion, not to mention the losses in deaths and casualties on the different fronts.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does not the Senator think it would be entirely proper to call attention to the fact that the Navy of the United States has done magnificent work in convoying the ships that bore over a million and a half of our young men to Europe, and convoyed the ships that have taken cargoes over and convoyed them on the return voyage? I do not know much about the Navy, I am frank to say, but I know the Navy has done most excellent work.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me to ask, Have we not one little warship on the Atlantic coast that can do battle with this trawler?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator puts that question to me?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It may be that when the German submarine commenced its operations here we might not have had any ships along this coast, because it is straining the resources of the Government to take our troops safely to Europe.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can take the Senator down the coast and show him a dozen warships on our coast.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am not particularly well advised about the Navy. It does not come under our jurisdiction; and the good Lord knows it takes all one's time to try to help out the military situation, but I think they ought to be given credit for the splendid work they have done in getting our men across without the loss of a single troopship.

Mr. McCUMBER. What has that to do in the matter of allowing a trawler here that has been captured and can not go over 10 to 12 knots per hour to destroy our fishing fleets all along the Atlantic coast?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, while I am on my feet, since the chairman of the committee has raised the point, my information is that the troops have been carried largely in British vessels.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am speaking only of convoys.

Mr. PENROSE. The convoys have been very largely, though not entirely, British vessels.

I saw in the paper the other day, I do not know in any way how accurate it is, that the American vessels in the Atlantic waters are a very small percentage of the total allied fleet.

I want to take this opportunity, Mr. President, to address an inquiry to the chairman, because he is present, as he generally is. Many of us were called upon a few weeks ago to vote against what is known as the Fall amendment and other amendments looking toward the enlargement of the draft ages.

Within a very few weeks after we had thus voted in the negative on the supposed request of the War Department that such legislation was not necessary we were called here unexpectedly and at great inconvenience to meet a complete change of front on the part of the Secretary of War, and encountered a situation in which the Secretary and his military advisers seemed to recommend the very proposition that we were asked to vote against. I do not know whether the inquiry has been addressed to the Senator in the Senate or not—I have not been present all the time during this debate—but I should like to ask him whether he has any information, in the hearings of the Secretary of War or in any other way, which would explain this complete change of front on the part of the department?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not know that there is any other explanation for it than that which the Secretary of War has given, either in the form of interviews with the members of the committee or possibly in the testimony, that they concluded to enlarge the military program, and that enlargement takes over more men per month than they had been taking in the past. In order to do that this legislation became more imperative than was expected to get men into service and of the draft.

Now, I was in sympathy with the Fall amendment and so stated on the floor of the Senate. I thought myself we ought to have passed it; but I yielded my judgment, as I stated to a number of Senators, at the request of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff.

Mr. PENROSE. With all due respect to the chairman of the committee, I do not consider that the so-called explanation of the Secretary of War is anything but an evasion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Probably.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator seems to agree with me. I sympathize with the position he faces in being compelled to call us here together in three weeks to meet a complete reversal on the part of the War Department. Certainly on first impression it would imply an absolute failure to comprehend the military requirements, which is almost beyond belief.

I do not often read from newspaper clippings in this body, but this is so pertinent that I simply desire to refer to it. I quote from the Evening Sun, of New York City.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What date?

Mr. PENROSE. Under date of August 17.

The article says:

It is well known that some months ago several Members of Congress, including Senator FRANCE, of Maryland, suggested the necessity of a large army, an army larger than could be raised by the 21-to-31-years draft law, and they introduced various bills and amendments to raise draft ages. Because their proposals were not sponsored by the administration it was to be expected that they would get little support. To their surprise, however, not only were their proposals not approved but they were actually declared to be repugnant to the War Department, which asserted there was no necessity of raising the draft ages.

It is now a matter of record that the War Department has seen the necessity for the draft-age increase that was urged by these Members many weeks ago. They are wondering what change could have taken place as to make a suggestion which was so repugnant to the authorities when it was made so much a necessity to-day that it must be passed into law with all speed.

BAKER OPPOSED DEPOSITIONS.

The answer lies, of course, in the fact that the War Department does not care to have Congress suggest legislation. This has been the course pursued for more than a year. In some cases, at least, it has resulted in delay in making efficient various branches of the Government. It is well known that Secretary Baker strongly opposed the suggested deposition of Gens. Sharpe and Crozier from the positions of Quartermaster General and of Chief of Ordnance, respectively, when made by the Military Committee of the Senate. It is equally well known that he deposed them himself after having apologized for and defended the work they did.

Suggestions for one-man control of the aircraft situation were strongly opposed by the administration for some time. When the agitation for the change died down because of administration opposition, the administration suddenly made the suggested change.

William Howard Taft has advocated for months an army of 5,000,000 men to defeat the Hun. Theodore Roosevelt strongly urged an army of something like that size. Yet it is only within the last few days that steps have been taken to raise such an army.

Universal military training has been openly denounced by Secretary of War Baker, and the administration has frowned on the attempts of Senators CHAMBERLAIN of Oregon, NEW of Indiana, and others to put such a principle in effect. Yet it now appears that something closely akin to universal training is to be put in effect through the new draft bill, although it will not bear the name of universal training.

A PUZZLING POLICY.

Just why the administration assumes the attitude of opposing everything suggested from the outside, whether good or bad, and accepts those ideas later, is somewhat of a puzzle to the Members of Congress. They admit it is better for the War Department to accept the good ideas late than not at all, but they do not understand why the ideas do not receive thorough consideration at the time they are presented.

Politics, personal vanity and glory, changing military conditions, and just plain inability to foresee conditions of the future all probably have had their part in this attitude of the War Department. The developments on the man-power bill, in which the War Department changed its attitude completely in the course of a very short time, have probably done more than any other one thing to convince Members that a militarist and not a pacifist ought to be Secretary of War.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the editorial which the Senator is reading does a gross injustice to the War Department. The testimony of the Secretary of War and of Gen. March before the Military Committee at the time the general military appropriation bill was under consideration and the statements of Senators here upon the floor of the Senate, including statements which I myself made, utterly disprove the suggestion that the War Department has changed its opinion as to increasing and lowering the draft ages and the enlargement of the Army.

What Gen. March and Secretary Baker said before the committee was that they did not approve the idea of engrafting upon the appropriation bill a hasty and necessarily ill-considered change in the draft law. What they asked was, and what we upon the floor of the Senate stated that they asked was, that the matter be postponed until August or September, when there would be ample time to take up this important question and to decide it in an intelligent way. They went on to say that the matter was under investigation by the War Department at that time; that the American authorities were in consultation with the international authorities, with those nations with which we are associated in the war, and that until they arrived at a definite understanding with those nations they did not think it advisable to propose a definite increase in the man power. Now, the lapse of time has occurred; those studies have been finished; the Senate's recess has come to an end; and the international authorities, including the United States, Great Britain, and France, have agreed upon what man power the United States shall put into the field. Thereupon the War Department comes forward with its proposal.

That is no change of mind; we are doing exactly what we expected to do; the delay has been exactly what the War Department suggested it should be. Many Senators who at that time approved the idea of increasing the man power agreed with the War Department that it would be better to leave it until this time and that no delay or any damage would thereby occur. Those are the facts; and the editorial is a misrepresentation, as I conceive it.

Mr. PENROSE. The department might even have left it until the international situation was fully confirmed by the return of the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I add also to the statement of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that there has been no loss of men by reason of this postponement of definite action? The men have been going over; they have been training, and the supply has not been diminished in any way under the present law.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have said all that I care to say.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Nebraska has said all he possibly could say on that point, it seems to me.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator has said enough and said it well. The Senator from Pennsylvania, however, made reference to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. I think, Mr. President, that the assumption that the Senator from Illinois is the alleged representative of the Government of the United States is gratuitous and unauthorized. I give this assurance advisedly.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, Mr. President, I can hardly believe that the statement of the Senator from Colorado is well founded. The junior Senator from Illinois, in a recent interview, stated that the President of the United States knew where he was [laughter], and any individual who is important enough to focus the attention of the President on his local habitation for the time being is of more than minor importance, in my opinion. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, of course, will be unable to preserve order in the galleries unless Senators preserve it on the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I think, in view of the cablegram recently received from France, that everybody knows where the junior Senator from Illinois is. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. Including the President.

Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs rather confesses that the Secretary of War has made no solid explanation of this matter; and it does not seem to me that the explanation of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is satisfying to a serious-minded person. It is difficult to understand why a conviction as to the size of our Army was not entertained three weeks ago when thousands of men were being killed every day and our armies were threatened with retreat and disaster and why some mysterious international round-up had to be made before the War Department knew whether or not we needed two or three million more men one way or the other.

That may satisfy the War Department, but it will certainly not satisfy the great mass of the American people. That Secretary Baker did not know we needed an Army of 4,000,000 men until two weeks ago is too ridiculous a statement to pass muster without a challenge.

I am more disposed to think that they did not dream that they could get the troops over so speedily as they have done, or that the fatal defect of procrastination prevailed, which I have observed in many of the departments, and even in this body, as, for instance, when the majority failed to have a quorum the other day for the consideration of this measure, or that element of personal vanity which insists that suggestions must emanate from the department. But what makes it embarrassing, Mr. President, to Senators like myself—and there are many who think on this point as I do—who want to support the administration, is that, at the request of the War Department, I voted against the Fall amendment and other amendments proposing to extend the draft ages and enlarge the Army. Now, however, within three weeks, I am called upon to reverse myself and vote for the pending bill, which enlarges the draft, including the provision lowering the draft age to 18, and other features. I intend to vote for it, but I intend to be more cautious in the future, Mr. President, how I listen to the passing requests of the War Department, with a view of not being placed again in the position of having, in a period of three weeks, to reverse my vote in a matter of the magnitude involved in the question whether the Army shall be 4,000,000 men or one and a half million men.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania if he voted against increasing the draft ages through any understanding or conviction communicated from the War Department or any other source that it would not be necessary in the future, and in the near future, to enlarge the draft ages?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, my own belief was that we ought to have adopted the amendments then pending, but having recently voted on several occasions against what I considered to be obnoxious measures of the administration, I thought I would purge my conscience by voting with the administration, and therefore I voted against the amendments referred to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understand, then, from the Senator from Pennsylvania, that he waived his individual convictions in order to vote with the administration, and as a result of that he now feels that he has stultified himself.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; and I confess my stultification in one case, whereas the Senator and his Democratic colleagues, having always trailed along behind the administration, have stultified themselves frequently.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we all have a very high regard for the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate. The members of that committee have had, during the time in which we have been engaged in war, a very difficult task to perform, at times a very delicate task, and I think every Member of the Senate hesitates to disagree with any part of a program outlined by that committee. But, after the best thought which I have been able to bring to the subject and a consideration which I have given to few subjects since the war began, I am unable to agree with a portion of this program. I feel that that disagreement is based upon such facts and conditions that I may justly ask the indulgence of the Senate for a short time while I state the grounds of disagreement.

Mr. President, when the case is made out and the necessity shown I shall vote to send the boys of 18 and 19 into military service. I shall dislike to do so at any time or under any consideration, but I am sure that I shall not hesitate when I feel the necessity has arisen. But in so grave a matter, involving as it does as serious a step as a legislator can be called upon to take, I want to feel clear in my own mind. I want the facts which will show that it is the only wise thing to do.

Our boys are the reserve force of our national life. Upon them we must depend for the future success and progress of our country physically, economically, and morally. As a matter of foresight and looking to the future as well as considering the immediate present, I do not want to draw on that reserve force until imperative necessity compels me to do so. It is the wise general who holds his reserves until the crisis commands them to be brought forth. It is the part of ordinary statesmanship not to deplete the reserves upon which we must depend for the great strain of the future until it seems there is no other alternative. The war must be won and won as quickly as possible. But we should not waste the boyhood or deal extravagantly with the future stay and support of the country. There will come a time after the war when we will appreciate having been most careful in the use of our young boys. If this fiendish plan to destroy free government requires the sacrifice we will make it, but I want to be satisfied that the occasion has arisen and can not with wisdom be postponed. I can not accept the unsupported opinion of any man upon this subject when I am called to vote. I want the facts.

Gen. March says in his testimony before the committee that we desire an army of 4,000,000 men upon the western front by next June. I am very glad to say that as a layman, although it adds nothing to the value of the opinion given by Gen. March, I am heartily in accord with that part of the program. I want to see 4,000,000 men upon the western front by June 1, and if the Government, or those in charge of the military affairs of the Government, feel in the meantime that it is necessary to have more, I shall follow their judgment in regard to that.

Some suggestions have been made that our Army should even be larger than 4,000,000 men. I take it that Gen. March and those with whom he is associated have in all probability raised the Army to as large a number as they feel it is possible to get to the western front; that they have called for as many men as it is possible to transport and to maintain when they are there. It is altogether probable that if we had a greater capacity for transporting and for maintaining them Gen. March and his associates would call for even a larger army; but I am perfectly willing in that respect to follow his judgment, whatever my judgment as a layman might be, as to the necessity of even a larger army.

Gen. March has also stated in his testimony that, in his opinion, even an army of 2,000,000 Americans could do almost anything in Europe, and that an army of 4,000,000 will walk through the German lines. I recognize that that is in all probability not only his judgment but the judgment of the able associates who surround him, his counselors and advisers, and probably the judgment of those on the other side. It is encouraging and inspiring to know that by putting 4,000,000 Americans in Europe by next June we can end the war. I do not offer any opinion on that, but I accept it as coming from those who are in charge of military affairs and console myself with the hope. I shall be happy if it transpires that after having placed these men there we shall succeed as is anticipated.

So, Mr. President, I do not want to say or do anything which will in the slightest manner hinder our having this number of men in Europe at that time. If I felt that we could not raise them otherwise than by summoning the boys of 18, so anxious am I to see a victory, and a speedy victory, and so willing am I to accept as to those particular matters the judgment of those in charge of the military affairs of the Nation, that I would vote for this bill as it stands. But, as I view the bill, the hearings disclose beyond mistake that there is not yet a necessity for calling the boys of 18 or even 19. If I am in error as to that I shall be glad to change my position when that error is shown, but if I could eliminate the deductions of Gen. March and Gen. Crowder I would be perfectly willing to submit their figures as a complete brief for the position which I shall take to-day. I feel that as a legislator I am just as much under obligations to draw deductions, and perhaps, with reference to this particular matter, under quite as great obligations to express my opinion, as those in charge of the military affairs. As was said yesterday by the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], there comes a time in this program when we as legislators are responsible. We can not shift the burden. If these boys are conscripted we alone are responsible. We are answerable as to who shall perform their service to the country and who shall be exempt; and we can not avoid that responsibility. We take upon ourselves the responsibility of setting aside these millions of men, if they are to be set aside, while the boys go to the front. We can not, in aftertime, place that responsibility either upon Gen. March or upon Gen. Crowder.

Mr. President, what has England done in regard to this matter? Her precedent and her example, it seems to me, are worth something as an illustration and something as an incentive and an inspiration to the American people at this time. England—sturdy, self-poised, far visioned and clear visioned, never discouraged or disconcerted by adversity—has been very careful up to this hour to preserve the youth of her country, upon whom the prestige and the future greatness of her country is to depend. Let us view the actions of that great nation and see whether or not we have reached a time when we must, in haste and inadvertence, call upon those who are boys but who must soon take over the burdens of government.

England has a population of from forty-seven to forty-eight million people. We have a population of 105,000,000 to 108,000,000 people. England put into her army, by voluntary enlistment alone, 4,000,000 people. She has raised up to this time six and a quarter million of people for the army. If we should raise the same number in proportion to our population, according to the statement of Lloyd-George in his great speech of August 7, we would have 15,000,000 men in arms. Before England put a single youth of the age of 18 upon the battle line, she, with a population of 47,000,000 or 48,000,000 people, had raised six and a quarter million men and put them in arms. And under what circumstances did she put the boys of 18 and 19 in battle? It was during the great drive which began upon the 21st of March. After Germany had had released from the eastern front her soldiers and concentrated them upon the western front and began her drive, upon the result of which depended the civilization of the world, you remember that it continued for weeks and weeks, and that every morning we arose to look at our papers with trembling lest they had broken through and gone into Paris and to the ports of France. Lloyd-George, in his speech, described the condition of affairs—the enemy knocking at the door—and said only under such circumstances could they have been justified in calling their boys of 18 and 19 into service.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator what the age limit for volunteering in England was during this period?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what the age limit for volunteering is. My understanding is that it was 19, but I can not say positively.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator know whether the volunteer army of Great Britain did or did not comprise boys of 18, 19, and 20?

Mr. BORAH. I know it is reported not to comprise boys of 18; I can not say, of course, with absolute certainty. But I judge from Lloyd-George's speech that they had never before been put in to fight. Speaking of the proposition of putting upon the battle front these boys of 18 and 19 and 20 under these perilous conditions, Lloyd-George says:

> We took a step which only the emergency could have justified; that is, the sending of lads of 18 and 20 * * * into the line.

After a nation of forty-seven or forty-eight million inhabitants had raised an army of six and a quarter million, they felt constrained, under those supreme conditions, to send the boys of 18 and 20 to the battle front. Have we, as a people, reached or neared that condition of affairs? Have we raised anywhere near from those over 21 the number England raised before she called on the boys?

Italy, engaged in the war for over three years, has refused to reduce her age limit below that of 19. France, brave, dauntless France, carrying the brunt of the fight for three years, has not gone below that of 19 yet. We, with an army of 1,700,000 over there and another going of 1,300,000, and 2,000,000 more to raise, an army of four to five millions, and 110,000,000 population, propose to call upon the boy of 18 to go and fight the battles of this country! Is it really true that we can not raise these 2,000,000 from our vast man power over 21?

Mr. President, the proposition has been put out that these boys will be called for training, and be trained for a length of time, and when they have been matured or have neared the age of majority they will be called into the service. If this were a matter of training these boys for service after they had reached the age of majority, of course we would not object, because I can realize that the time may come in this contest when we will necessarily have to call them; but that is not this program. Every one of these boys of 18, 19, and 20 is supposed to be upon the fighting line in Europe on the 30th day of next June. The boy of 18 and 6 months will be there; the boy of 19 and 6 months will be there; the boy of 20 and 6 months will be there, with six months' training, and no more. This is not a question of universal military training, such as was suggested in the report of Secretary Knox, read by the able Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] a few days ago. This is a question of calling men for service just as soon as they can be trained and fitted for service. This is calling to fight with a hurried training. It is expected to have this Army ready for fighting as soon as possible. Gen. March was very frank about this, as is characteristic of both March and Crowder. So, we can not be misled nor need we be confused by mixing this subject with that of universal military training.

Now, Mr. President, let us look at these figures for a minute and see the story they tell.

First, bear in mind that we have 6,000,000 men in classes 2, 3, and 4 under the present draft law set aside, exempt. Then we have a figure given us by Gen. Crowder of 10,028,973 between the ages of 32 and 45. You have there 16,028,973 men, including those of classes 2, 3, and 4 under the present law, from which to draw an army of 2,000,000 men—for that is what we propose to raise—men matured, men under equally great or greater obligation to serve, men millions of whom are fit to serve. Sir, what I am really arguing for here is reclassification. It all comes to that. Shall we take the boy of 18 rather than reclassify?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. In just a minute. Is it claimed, Mr. President, and if so, upon what is the claim based, that we can not get an army of 2,000,000 out of sixteen to seventeen million men? It is so claimed because they refuse to reclassify.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire, in connection with the Senator's argument, to call attention to this phraseology in the pending bill on page 2, line 6:

Provided, That the President may draft such persons liable to military service in such sequence of ages and at such time or times as he may prescribe.

Under this language it would be possible to call to the colors and place in the battle line all the boys of 18 before any of those of a higher age were called.

Mr. BORAH. It is evident from the testimony that Gen. March is in favor of that proposition, because he says they make better soldiers.

Now, let us see what we do with these 16,000,000 men.

The total number of males in the United States who are 32 to 45 is given as 10,028,973.

Deduct arbitrarily 7,734,482 men married.

Deduct 902,607 deferred for other reasons.

Total deducted, 8,367,089 men.

Subtract 8,367,089 from 10,028,973 and it leaves 1,391,884 men. Then deduct again, for estimated physical unfitness, 435,378, which leaves a total number of effective men between 32 and 45 of 601,236 out of 10,028,973. In order to reach the boy of 18, you deduct every man except 601,236. Upon what theory? We will come to that in a few moments.

Now, let us see the other figures as to the boys under age.

Total number of males from 18 to 21, 3,171,671.

Deduct married, 158,185.

Deduct for other reasons, 114,179, giving a total of 272,354.

Subtract 272,354 from 3,171,671, which leaves 2,899,317.

Deduct for physical unfitness, enlistments, aliens, and so forth, 1,101,708, which leaves a total number of effective serving men under the age of 21 of 1,797,609.

We propose to raise under this bill an army of 2,000,000 men, and out of that army we propose to raise 1,797,000 from boys under age. We take people to the number of 10,028,000 between 32 and 45 and from them raise 600,000 men. We take the boys then under age and raise from them 1,797,000.

Now, friends, do not forget that in the Army to-day there are nearly a million men under age fighting in France. Add to that the 1,797,000, and this great war—a war for civilization and liberty—is being fought by the boys of the country, by those under the age of majority. I believe, sir, that there are 2,000,000 men both fit and willing out of this 6,000,000 deferred under the present law and the 10,028,000 between 32 and 45. I am sure they are fit and I am equally sure they are willing to go.

My friends, do you think it is necessary, in order to raise 2,000,000 men, to take these boys? Do not forget the fact that when the first conscription bill came into this body, when we only proposed to raise a few hundred thousand men, they then started at 19 years of age. It was then proposed to take boys of 19 and 20 in order to raise 500,000 or 1,000,000 men from a population of 108,000,000 people; and now, in order to make it a certainty, they arbitrarily relieve from service 741,000 men—arbitrarily.

What is the reason given for calling these boys? The first reason is said to be that we do not want to invade classes 2, 3, and 4. Why do we not want to invade classes 2, 3, and 4? Are there no men in classes 2, 3, and 4 so situated that they can be called upon to serve their country? But the statement is made that if we invade classes 2, 3, and 4 it will interfere with the social and industrial life of the Nation, and that it is necessary to set aside this large number from the 10,000,000 men in order to preserve the social and industrial poise and efficiency of the country. It is strikingly strange to me, Mr. President, that the boy who is able to carry the accouterments of war, to handle the death-dealing, hellish instruments of destruction, to go to the battle line and bear a man's part, is not considered capable of discharging the ordinary duties in the industrial conditions of the country.

Why is it that the man of 31 or 32 is more necessary unless we assume that the boy is unfit to perform his duties and to do service in the industrial world? If he is indeed immature and undisciplined for that kind of work, shall we send him for a more strenuous and a more burdensome task, and that is fighting the battles of his country? Give him an equal chance. Let him have his proportion of the home industrial work. Let him be dealt with fairly and equally and proportionately to the others, and you will not have to reach the age of 18 at all.

I read in a newspaper editorial two days ago:

If men were called to the Army without any consideration of their dependents, the result would be a tremendous increase in the number of persons who are charges upon the public. Suffering would increase, charities would multiply, and eleemosynary institutions would be overcrowded. It is to avoid this condition that the selections are made with due regard for the dependents.

That does not dispose of the proposition that there are hundreds of thousands of people in this country who are not indispensable at all to the industries of the country and who have no dependents in any true sense of the word who could be called without interfering at all with our social and industrial conditions.

I have had a gentleman who I believe capable estimate the number of men engaged in nonessential industries in this country, and he tells me that there are over 2,000,000 men over the age of 21 and under the age of 45 engaged in nonessential industries in the country in no wise necessary for the running of the war who could respond to this call.

Shall we permit these unessential things to go forward, a mere coining of dollars and cents out of the war? Shall we continue to be married to the material side of this question and overlook entirely the value to a country of an educated and sound youth? Would we prefer to close the schools and colleges to closing these nonessential industries?

We are not yet stripped for war. When we are, these unessential industries which call for so many who are fit to serve in the war should be closed before we call upon those of 18 and 19 to take up arms.

But is not the boy of 18 or 19 a part of our industries? Is there any more vital employment than that which the boys of 18, 19, and 20 are doing throughout all the Middle West and the West? The only farm help that you have got in the Middle West and the West upon which you can rely is the boy of 17, 18, 19, and 20. The only man upon whom you can rely throughout the season and who remains with you is the boy who has been reared upon the farm and is a part of it. The itinerant workman comes and goes; he is utterly unreliable. If he has reached the age of 21 to 35, he leaves and goes into more lucrative industries where he can get a higher wage. He has departed, but the boy of 17, 18, 19, and 20 remains and is essential and indispensable to the raising of the vast crops which it is necessary to have in order to feed those who are in Europe. A man of wide experience and wide acquaintance wrote me a few days ago:

Our boys are now the support of the farm. We have no other reliable help. Already the draft law has crippled us throughout the Middle West. Now, if the boys of 18, 19, and 20 go, we know not where to look for help.

Are not those boys essential to a most vital industry? Can you say that you are not interfering with vital industries?

And as to interfering with the social life of the Nation, could a greater blow be given to our national life than to close our schools and colleges, to deprive our young fellows of education, and send them out to be maimed and killed? It is quite as vital to the social life of the Nation as that of husband and wife where they have ample means to take care of the wife.

A few days ago in one of the little towns in a Western State, even under the call of the present draft law, after the call had been made, three farmers came into town, turned their crops and their utensils over to the bank, and said, "Our boys are gone. If you can get anything out of this, take charge of it."

You can not claim, Senators, that the boy of 18, 19, and 20 has not his place in the social and industrial world. He is just as essential to the work as the man from 21 to 45, with the exception of a few men who are overseers or in charge of business, and there is a very small percentage of those.

There is not a Senator in this Chamber but can think over and in his mind count instance after instance of a man under the present draft law from 21 to 31 who was exempted simply because he was married. His wife may be perfectly capable of taking care of herself, they may be perfectly independent and have ample means, and yet by reason of the fact that he is married or probably has a child he is exempted from the service.

Mr. President, it is no purpose of mine to criticize the able men at the head of our Military Establishment. In common with the people of this country, I respect the great ability and patriotism of the Secretary of War, Gen. March and Gen. Crowder, and their associates and advisers. They are rendering great and distinguished service to their country. I have long hesitated before expressing any views out of line with their program. But looking at our national life steadily and as a whole, and especially in times like these, one comes inevitably to entertain some very firm convictions. We are not permitted to look alone to the days that are passing, but we are to consider also the days that are coming, when the strain will be equal almost to the strains and burdens of the war. And viewing the situation as a whole, the exigencies of the present and the undoubted demands of the future, I confess I want to be economical in the flesh and blood of the youth of our land. I want to conserve, in so far as it is wise and safe under present conditions to do so, the brain and the possibilities of those who must soon assume the task of rehabilitating a tax-ridden, debt-burdened, and war-torn Republic.

Of course, you will say to me in answer that we will have no Republic to rehabilitate if we do not send these boys to fight back and destroy its enemies. When I am satisfied of that I will vote to send them. But in order to show that it is necessary to send them now you eliminate from military service hundreds of thousands whose duty it is to take up this burden. My contention is not that the boys of 18 and 19 should not go, but that they should not go until those who are under equal or greater obligations shall have been called.

When that has been done, if the necessity still exists, they should go. Yes; we will throw the boys of our homes into the pawn before we will submit to anything else than victory. But as a wise and prudent and humane people, we will not do this until the matured men fit and capable have fully met their country's call.

Remember, Senators, no sacrifice for country is equal to that which the boy makes before he has been fitted for the battle of life. He is too young to vote. He is too young to command. The lads, it seems, are only fitted for frightful sacrifices. Whatever else happens, you know he will go into the trenches. His position, therefore, is not only the most circumscribed, but his obligation is the most exacting. He not only offers his young life, health, and limb, but he forfeits all opportunities for that preparation which in this day and age of the world is so essential to success. If he is so fortunate as to return from the war, he will return to civil life handicapped, his education interrupted, his plans broken, and all his life dreams changed. The boy not only offers his life on the battle field, but is also hazarding to a greater extent than anyone else success in life after the war. I beg to say again that it seems to me the case is not made out for this program; the facts and figures do not sustain the demand; reason and justice do not seem to me to support this provision of the bill.

I am willing to agree with those who say we must not let sentiment stand in the way of victory. I especially agree with those who call for complete victory. I am even willing, for the sake of the argument, to agree with you all when you say that war tramples under foot all ties of kin and blood, all bonds of human sympathy; that it turns a deaf ear to the voice of humanity and silences the plea of the mother. But I can not agree to that arbitrary program which places the burden of this war upon those who are yet in their minority but who, it seems, must fight their country's battles and then come home and pay its debts. I will not agree that war wipes out justice and equality of burdens among our own people. I can not agree that we should draw first and heaviest and disproportionately from the only guaranty that we have for the future—the brain and soul, the flesh and blood of the youth of our country.

Senators, remember when you vote to conscript these boys of 18 and 19 we are proposing to raise an army of only 4,000,000 men. According to the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], nearly a million of those upon the front are now under age. According to these figures, we are going to put nearly 2,000,000 more in the Army who are under age, and this Nation, with a population of 108,000,000 people, will have 4,000,000 men on the battle front, and nearly 3,000,000 of them will be boys under age. Is it fair? Is it just? Is it manly? Is it noble? Is it in harmony with the supreme and sublime task before us? Have we as a people risen to the ordeal of the hour? Is this in accordance with the conscience and honor and manhood of a great people?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it was not my purpose to enter into this debate, but after listening to some of the remarks that I have heard on this floor I can not help but give my views on the question before the Senate.

I want to say first of all that I have had no trouble about this war from the very beginning. As soon as the great war broke out in Europe it was evident to me that it would ultimately be our war as much as the war of those countries in Europe. It was evident to me that if Germany should succeed in vanquishing France and England and obtain complete control of the Continent in Europe there would be no place in the sun for America; that we would be the next victims of German aggression. So from the very beginning my heart has been in favor of this war. At the earlier stages of it we met all kinds of objection in one form or another, some sugar-coated, others not, but we finally got to a sound military basis.

Now, I do not refer to anybody in this Chamber, but the men who claim to be spokesmen for the boys of 18 and 19 and 20 hardly realize what they are talking about. Those boys are the most patriotic among all our people. If we were to-day to raise a volunteer army instead of resorting to the draft, it would be the boys of 17, 18, and 19 who would fill our ranks.

More than that, Mr. President, those boys are not as a rule grumbling. It comes from some of their uncles, aunts, and other relatives. The boys themselves are anxious to go, and in my opinion, and in the opinion of all military men who have had any experience about it, boys 18, 19, and 20 make the very best soldiers we can possibly get. Take a man after he is over 30 years. He has not got the physical tenacity, he can not stand the stress and strain of marching, watching, and fighting as they have to do in these modern times. He becomes sick and goes to the hospital. To send a lot of these superannuated men, as I call men over 30, to Europe and put them in the fighting line would be simply having that many to carry back in the course of a year.

There is another thing I want to disabuse Senators about. They think these young men who go into the Army will come back ruined; that they will enter our body politic a depraved and inferior class, because they have been in the Army.

Mr. President, in my opinion the best education a young man of 18 or 19 can have is to have a postgraduate course of one year at least in the Army of the United States. It takes the conceit out of him, makes a man of him, and enables him to enter upon the vicissitudes of life with energy and perseverance.

Did our old soldiers of the Grand Army of the Republic, or did the Confederate veterans, when they returned to their homes prove a bad element in our body politic? Were they ruined and depraved men? When the Stuarts came into possession of the government after they had overwhelmed Cromwell and his government, they disbanded those old veterans who had fought under the Commonwealth. A good many of the followers of the House of Stuart said that there was great danger to the British people by disbanding those soldiers; that they would be a vicious and dangerous lot in the community. But the historian Macaulay tells us that they were needlessly alarmed. He said that wherever you traveled through any village in England, if you found an industrious mechanic, a thrifty and prosperous shoemaker, or a well-to-do carpenter and scratched his head you found he would be one of Oliver Cromwell's old soldiers.

Look at the Confederate soldiers. They had a harder time of it than we did when they returned home, but they buckled to their task and did their duty as good citizens in rehabilitating their country. So with our people here, when the boys march back after this war in Europe, whether they were 17 or 18 or 19 years old, they will come back better citizens, more loyal, and with a higher spirit of patriotism than they ever had before. They will never be a menace or a danger to the community, and they will not come back as ruined men.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. FALL. Who ran this country in every State and the National Government for 34 years after the Civil War? Who filled the Halls of this and the other House?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, in the North that service was performed in large part by the old soldiers, and in the South the same rights were accorded to their veterans.

I come now to another matter. The great war is still going on, and we are far from having attained victory. The most critical time of this war, barring the first battle of the Marne, was on the 21st day of March last, when the Germans inaugurated their great offensive. They had had months in which to bring back their divisions from the Russian front; they had eliminated all of the sick and the feeble; they had assembled such an army as they had never before had, and it was all concentrated on the western front. They saw the importance, indeed they felt the necessity of crushing the allies before the American troops in large numbers could arrive on the scene.

What was the result? The allies met with a reverse. The British Fifth Army on the left flank to the north, owing partly to the fact that the Portuguese troops on the extreme left gave way, and partly owing to the fact of being surprised had to retire. Upward of 60,000 prisoners were taken and a large quantity of ammunition and guns was captured. That was the most critical time of the war since the first battle of the Marne.

Mr. President, in this connection I want to call attention to an extract from a speech of Lloyd-George delivered in the House of Commons on the 5th of August last. After describing the utter collapse of the English Fifth Army, and how they were forced to fall back, he said:

> Look what has been done. In February the Americans brought over 48,000 men, I think. In January it was still fewer, and the German general staff, which seems fairly well informed, came to the conclusion that if what was said in the British press of our having no men was true, and they knew what was being brought over in American ships was true, and if what a certain section of the press said about our having no ships was true, then the destruction of the allied army was a certainty.

What did the British do?

> Before the battle was over—

Referring to the battle on March 21—

> in a fortnight's time 268,000 men were thrown across the channel, one of the most remarkable feats of British shipping, and the organization of our British transport and for the war office. In a month's time 355,000 men had been thrown across the channel. A fresh gun had been put back for every gun that was lost, and every deficiency in a machine gun, not merely supplied, but the number increased.

Now, here is what I desire particularly to call to your attention:

> Our losses were great. We took a step which only the emergency could have justified, that is the sending of lads of 18 and 20, who had received five or six months' training, into the line.

Then he proceeds:

> I remember coming at 9 o'clock one dark night from Boulogne after I had been to see the generals. I saw these boys coming up by torchlight from the boat straight to France. No sooner were they there than these lads had to face veteran and victorious troops. No veterans ever fought with greater courage and with greater splendor than these lads to help hurl back these legions that had fought to destroy the British Army. We must all be proud of the boys who so upheld the honor of their British native land and helped to save the cause of the allies from disaster.

There, Mr. President, you have ample proof of the efficiency of soldiers from 18 to 21 years of age. The fact is that they make the best soldiers. They can stand more hard work; they have more energy, more vim; and, what is more, they can really be better spared from home than can any other class of men of whom I know.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota, who was a soldier in the Civil War, how old he was when he entered the Army?

Mr. NELSON. I was a little over 18 years of age.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the Senator entered as a private soldier?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir; I entered as a private soldier and attained to the high rank of a corporal. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Which rank the Senator from Minnesota greatly dignified.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to suggest this thought to the Senator, in connection with what he is saying: We are holding responsible for the conduct of the war those who have made a thorough study and investigation of this whole subject. The question therefore arises, Can we deny to them the resources and supplies which they say are necessary to carry out the program decided upon? In connection with what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has said on the subject this morning, I desire to call attention to the hearings on page 72, where the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] propounded this inquiry to the Secretary of War:

> Senator JOHNSON. I find in talking to Members of Congress a decided reluctance to decrease the draft age to 18. I confess to a similar reluctance. I think, however, that those with whom I have talked—and I know this is my personal attitude—are all willing to do it if the military necessities and the exigencies demand and require it. As I understand it, that is the situation?
>
> Secretary BAKER. That is my belief about it.
>
> Senator JOHNSON. So in order to carry out the purposes for which we have entered this war, successfully to prosecute it, this particular measure you deem essential?
> Secretary BAKER. I believe that to be the fact. My own judgment about it originally was that 19 should be the minimum, and I came to the 18 minimum only after very thorough study of the situation and with some reluctance, but finally believing it to be necessary to secure the appropriate number of men.

That is the opinion of the Secretary of War on that subject.

Mr. BORAH. Permit me to say that the same kind of testimony, not referring particularly to Mr. Baker, was introduced in support of the first conscription bill, which started with 19 years of age. It was stated that in order to raise the small army that we were then proposing to raise it was necessary to take the 19 and 20 year old boys.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, inasmuch as Secretary Baker and other officials have been quoted on this matter, I beg leave to say I have always thought, with due respect to Mr. Baker and some of the other officials of the War Department, that in many respects they were not equal to the situation. It has been a slow process to educate Secretary Baker up to the standard set by this new draft law.

Mr. President, I am for this bill with its age limits for these reasons:

First, because I am in favor of getting the most efficient set of soldiers that we can "over there," so that we shall not have to be carrying an army over and bringing an army of invalids back again.

In the next place, young men at this age are not married; as a rule they have not entered into any business engagement. They are, as might be said, to use an everyday phrase, footloose, and are of the classes of men who can be better spared out of the community than can other men. Take the men of advanced years, from 35 to 45, and you will find that the most of them are engaged in business or in the pursuit of some useful calling where they are needed. Such men are of little use as soldiers. I remember that in the company in which I served the men when they enlisted were nearly all under 20 years of age. We had, however, an Englishman who was the oldest man in the company. We called him "Old Dad," though he was only 35 years of age; he was half the time on the sick list or attending the surgeon's call. He was not an effective soldier at all, although otherwise he was an estimable man.

I sometimes wish, Mr. President, that I could share the feelings of some of those who indulge in this maudlin sentiment, but I fear that my years and my experience, both in the Army and outside, have made me rather callous, so that I can not indulge in hysterics in behalf of the boys of 18, 19, and 20.

Furthermore, I believe the best education these boys can get is that which will be derived from their life and training in the Army. A boy who has attended college or high school, if he goes into the Army, will receive an education and training that he can acquire nowhere else. The Army to-day is a perfect paradise compared with the army in which our soldiers served in the days of the Civil War. Now our soldiers have innumerable advantages and facilities which were then unheard of. They have the comforts and benefits afforded by the Y. M. C. A. and other organizations; they have the Red Cross; they have the service of dentists, and in many other directions are provided for in a manner heretofore unknown. They have movie shows and other entertainment, and they get food and clothing that we never thought of in the days of the Civil War. Why, Mr. President, the soldiers in the Union Army never had ham and bacon; we received nothing but salt pork in the brine or salt beef in the brine, and hardtack. In those days we were not even able to get "Hoover bread."

We have evidence as to how the boys feel. We provided for an increase of the Marine Corps, that increase to be secured by voluntary enlistment. Under that provision over 13,000 of the number we authorized to be recruited for that corps were made up of boys 18, 19, and 20 years of age who voluntarily enlisted. Look at the magnificent record the Marines made in France at Chateau Thierry. When the Germans had succeeded in compelling the French to retire and were forcing them to the rear that small brigade of Marines hastened to the front, drove the Germans back, and turned the tide of battle, which ultimately led to victory. That was the nearest point to the city of Paris which the Germans reached since the first battle of the Marne.

I wish to say to Senators that few of the boys under 21—and they are our most patriotic citizens—will thank you for trying to exempt them. I venture to say that if the door is left open for volunteers more boys of 18, 19, and 20 will volunteer than of any other class of our citizens.

I am for the prosecution of this war with the greatest efficiency. What we need is an overwhelming army "over there" in Europe. I think it was Bonaparte who said that the Lord was on the side of the strongest battalions. So, Mr. President, in order to be victorious in this war we want to outnumber and outclass our enemies.

We can outnumber them if we extend the draft as is proposed by this bill, and we can outclass them if we have a large portion of our Army made up of soldiers from 18 to 21 years of age. I am anxious to have this war terminated as soon as possible, and that is one of the reasons why I am heartily in favor of the bill. It would be too bad to allow the war to drag and drag and drag as our air program has done. The sooner we can finish it the better for the people of this country and the better for the entire civilized world.

Let no man be alarmed concerning our boys when they come home again. I will make the prediction that as the Confederate veterans in the South and the Grand Army boys in the North came to the front in political life in their respective sections of the country, so it will be found when this great war is over that the soldiers of our grand Army in France will have to be reckoned with. Those soldiers are not possessed of such a spirit as some of our citizens have indicated in connection with this draft bill.

Mr. President, I did not intend to take more than a moment to speak on this bill. I sincerely trust that the bill may pass in the form in which it is now pending before the Senate, especially in respect to the age limit.

There is another provision in the last part of the bill looking to the education of the soldiers after they return, which I think is unnecessary, and yet I shall not vote against it. When the boys come home from the war I think they will know what to do with themselves. They will know whether they want to go to school or enter into active business, and I feel confident that very few of them are likely to avail themselves of the provision in the bill to which I have referred. However that may be, I shall make no objection to it, although I repeat that, in my opinion, it is wholly unnecessary.

Aside from that, it is a good bill, and I wish to congratulate Gen. March and Secretary Baker on finally coming to see the light. It is a pity that they did not see it long ago; it is a pity that they did not see it three or four months ago, in which event there would have been no necessity for the present urgency. However, it is better to be late than never to arrive. It is our duty now, if we want to prosecute the war successfully, to give our country an army that will be victorious, and I therefore hope that this bill, with the age limit as proposed, may pass.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] criticized the Navy Department this morning because the Germans were able, by capturing one of our trawlers with a submarine, and putting 16 men on board of her, to ravage to a certain extent our fishing fleets. Of course that is a deplorable thing. It is deplorable that the fishermen should be deprived of their livelihood. In former wars they have rarely been interfered with; but, of course, Germany is making this war as horrible and as barbaric and as uncivilized as possible, and she has taken this opportunity to hit the fishermen along with everybody else.

It seems to me, however, that the learned Senator is missing the main gist of the question. What we want to do is to win the war, to bottle up the submarines as nearly as possible at their base, to convoy our armies and transports of food and other necessary materials to Europe, and to carry on the major operations of the war. We can only be successful in our military and naval operations by attacking the main objectives and centralizing our efforts on things that are absolutely essential. This the Navy Department has very wisely done; and the result has been that we have carried a million and a half men to France without the loss, I believe, of a single transport that was convoyed by the American fleet. We have also so aided the British and French Navies in the splendid work they are carrying on that they have turned from a defensive to an offensive warfare against the submarine; and the result of that has been that the submarines instead of concentrating along the coasts of England and France, have had to go elsewhere and try to do damage farther from their home base and farther from the center of the circle, for, after all, the greatest results are to be accomplished on the coasts of England and France near the Channel, where all the traffic lines concentrate. This has been said time and time again. As you get farther and farther away from the center you meet less and less ships, and the chances of the submarine are less and less for destroying numbers of merchantmen.

The aid that we have been able to give the British Navy has resulted in increased submarine destruction, forcing a change of their plans, and the necessity of seeking to do damage elsewhere. Of course, they did not want to give up their policy of attacking near the English coast. They only did it reluctantly, and when it was forced upon them by the superiority of our offensive against them. Now they come to this shore, to my mind largely with the idea of propaganda, with the idea that if they could wreak havoc along our own coast possibly some outcry might be made among the American people, and that ships, destroyers, and submarine chasers might be withdrawn to this country from Europe, where they were essential, and then they would be able to reap the great harvest that they had before. But what we must do, and what the Navy Department is doing to-day, is to stick firmly to its original and sound policy of concentrating its efforts along the European coast, France, and England and the Mediterranean, where necessary, but principally France and England, and then, when that has been looked after, to take care as best we may of the other exigencies of the naval war—our fishing boats and our coastwise vessels that are far out at sea.

The Germans are only repeating the history of naval warfare in the slight successes of their commerce-destroying venture. The fallacy of the German submarine policy from the beginning has been that it has been commerce destroying, and only that. I believe that it is sound naval theory that where a vessel is used whose object is solely commerce destroying, it is bound to be a minor operation and in the end fail. In our own War of 1812 we were able, with the Constellation and the President and other of our fast frigates, to do great harm to the English carrying trade. We lay in the route of the Indian trade; we made them raise the rates of insurance; we made ourselves most unpleasant, and we made them send frigates out to attack us; but in the end we were doomed to failure, and in the end our frigates were driven off the seas.

The Atlantic Ocean is a very big place. We have an enormous coast to defend. There are at least 1,500 miles of our coast, if we take it on a straight line, and not only that but if we go further and take into consideration the Canadian coast and the great fishing banks we are really seeking for a needle in a haystack. I contend that while we deplore these losses, we must not play the German game and think for one moment that we should change our policy and weaken in any way the support we are giving to our allies and the magnificent work that we are accomplishing.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat may I ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GERRY. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator's statement of what our Navy has achieved in this war, and what it is capable of achieving, only adds to the reason for being astounded at a spectacle such as we have observed, of a little trawler of 8 to 10 knots an hour plying along our coast for a week and destroying fleet after fleet of fishing vessels. I am informed that we have a vast number, perhaps hundreds, of submarine chasers along all through the ports of New England. I am informed that we have battle ships, probably not of the higher class, because most of them are in European waters, but we have them along in all of our ports. I have also been informed by a Senator that this submarine was actually discovered, and that two depth bombs were sent directly over it and both of them failed to explode.

But that deals with the U boats; and the Navy can not be responsible in any way if by a possibility these depth bombs did not explode. I have this only upon information. But the main thing that I wanted to get at was, why it was possible, with the vast number of chasers and warships we have along our coast—and I do not want to draw from our Navy across the ocean—for a little slow-running vessel, that could not make over 8 or 10 knots an hour, and could not get under the waves, though possibly small enough to hide behind them, to escape detection and destruction and continue its ravages for a whole week? Now, there may be an explanation for it, but the average American does not understand what it is; and if there is a good one we will all be glad to hear it.

Mr. GERRY. I am very glad to have the Senator's further statement and explanation. I think the reason of the escape of the trawler Triumph from our defensive fleet is a simple one and one that I have already given, namely, that the ocean is a very large place, and this trawler has been lying fairly well out at sea. I do not know, but very likely there have been fogs, and simply by a question of chance she has not been sighted by one of our patrol vessels; or probably, if she were sighted in the earlier part of her career, they might not have known that she was an enemy ship.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but let me suggest that we have known within a very few hours, at least, when one of these fishing fleets has been destroyed, and an 8 or 10 knot vessel could not get very far into the ocean before we would be able to find out something about its whereabouts.

Mr. GERRY. My recollection is that they did not know for a week that that vessel was sunk. I am speaking simply from memory now, from reports I saw in the press.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the part of the country from which I come is the one most immediately affected by the recent operations of the U boat and of the trawler Triumph. In regard to the fishing fleet, the vessels that fish on the Georges Bank, where the first destruction by the U boat occurred, I think, were exclusively Massachusetts boats, and the great bulk of the Bank fishermen are composed of the Gloucester fleet. Therefore the interest of all the people on that coast of my State is very profound in these operations.

Mr. President, meeting the U boats coming up out of the Atlantic is an extremely difficult thing. On the other side of the water the whole commerce of England and France finally comes into what may be called the narrow seas. It has to come there, and the U boats are operating in a very restricted field, comparatively speaking, the field where they are most certain to meet incoming and outgoing ships; and, of course, their enemies have the same advantage of a restricted area, where the U boat is most certain to be found. Yet, with that advantage of a restricted area, comparatively speaking, we know how many U boats have escaped the British destroyers and submarine chasers and inflicted vast damage on the commerce of the world. We have no such narrow waters here. Of course, the bulk of the shipping finally comes into the harbor of New York or into the harbor of Boston, but the ships come up to those harbors right out of the ocean, especially the harbor of Boston.

Now, Mr. President, if you know that there is a needle in a haystack, it is a very difficult thing to determine beforehand just at what point in the haystack it is coming out. They have to be on the lookout, as they are and have been all along, at every likely place.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] spoke of the failure of those depth bombs. I was at home at the time that happened, and I know as well as I know anything that the hydroplanes were over the submarine, and saw her. There is a dispute about the bombs. The first story was that they had bombs and dropped them, and they turned out to be useless—what are commonly called, I believe, "duds." In any event, they did not explode. I have also seen it stated that they had no bombs.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. GERRY. I am informed that they did have bombs, and that there was a reason why they did not explode. I do not know that I am at liberty to make the reason public.

Mr. LODGE. I only knew there was some discussion about it, and I have not been in Washington long enough to get all the details.

But now we come to the question of the trawler, the Triumph. I think the question which the Senator from North Dakota puts is a very natural one. If I remember correctly, the trawler was seized or made her first destruction on the 20th of August, and I think I am right in saying that the information was received by the Navy Department on the 21st. To-day is the 24th. Three days is not a long time in which to find a small vessel on the Atlantic Ocean. I am at liberty to state that every possible vessel in the way of destroyers or submarines or any other kind of craft useful for the capture or destruction of such a vessel as the Triumph has been sent to that area, where the trawler has been at work. They are covering this area with all the vessels possible without interfering with what are necessary for convoys, which have first to be considered, and, of course, without bringing home destroyers from British and French waters, which would be a great misfortune and a great mistake. But a large number of vessels suitable for the work of capturing the Triumph or destroying her are on the ground or on the way to the ground.

The trawler was in the region, as I understand, of the Grand Banks. That is a region of mists. An almost perpetual fog hangs about the Banks. It is not an easy place to hunt a trawler or any other comparatively small vessel. All I desired to say was that the Navy Department, of course, feel a keener anxiety about this matter than any other branch of our Government. Their attention is concentrated on it. They are doing, I am sure—in fact, I know—everything that can be done to capture that boat which is on the surface. I believe they will succeed in doing so, for I do not believe a surface boat can long escape, even in the great expanse of the Atlantic Ocean.

As for getting the U boats, that is necessarily a matter, to a certain extent, of chance; but there again they are using every resource that they have in submarine chasers, in hydroplanes, in wireless telegraph to get at the submarine.

I think the Senate and the country may rest assured that there is nothing which knowledge and ingenuity can suggest which is not being done by the Navy Department at this moment to try to reach and capture or destroy the trawler and also the U boats.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I send to the desk a proposed amendment which, while not offering it at present, I ask may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "prescribe," in line 8, page 2, insert the following:

Except that persons under the age of 20 years shall not be called into other than training service, and that periods of training for persons under such age shall be so prescribed as to least interfere with farm work or production on the part of those actually so engaged or with the attendance of duly registered and bona fide students at school or college.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the proviso to which these words are added by way of amendment is as follows:

Provided, That the President may draft such persons liable to military service in such sequence of ages and at such time or times as he may prescribe.

Mr. President, I am in hearty sympathy with the general purpose of this bill. That purpose is to materially increase the armed forces of the United States, and to increase them with all possible speed, in order that we in conjunction with our heroic allies may all the earlier win this war and compel the acceptance by the central powers of the terms of a just peace, and by a just peace I mean such a peace as that so admirably and forcibly described and defined on yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Nothing else will be a righteous peace or involve that element of retributive justice which ought to prevail.

I agree to the proposition, too, that "the sooner the better," the better because in the end it will be cheaper and involve less of loss both in money and in men than if we went at the business or at any time continued in the business slowly and hesitatingly. To make the struggle as short, sharp, and decisive for our side as possible should be the mainspring of all effort to enlist, to equip, and put on the battle front from one and a half to three million more men who can fight only as the trained American soldier can fight.

Nor would I be particular which battle front. It is likely that the battle that decides the issue will be fought in the west, where have been the greatest stress and struggle from the very beginning. It is barely possible that such a battle is being fought there even now; I hope so. But, with due regard to the relative importance of the several fronts and the question where our men are most needed, we should strike Germany wherever our resources and the numbers and the strength of our forces will permit, whether it be on the Italian front, in the Balkans, in the Ukraine, or on the Murman coast to the north, or in aiding our latest allies, the Czecho-Slovaks, in holding against both the Germans and the Bolsheviki the great Siberian railway, or whether it be on that worst of all battle-torn and devastated fronts, that of northern France.

But, Mr. President, what are the necessities of the hour? What are the requirements in order that we may take this proud place and do our great part in the complete defeat and overthrow of the German military power? Is it necessary that we go far beyond what we have ever gone before, beyond what until lately we never dreamed we would go in this war, and draft into actual over-seas service the boys of 18 years of age? Let Gen. March himself answer in part. Not long ago, as I understand it, he thought 2,000,000 men would be required for the task. I should have said that that estimate was too conservative; that our distinguished and able Chief of Staff would not have surprised the American people when he made that utterance if instead he had then said three or even four instead of two million men. But now, in the hearings of a few days ago only, Gen. March is reported as saying:

It is my belief that with an Army of 4,000,000 of men in France under one commander we can go through the German line wherever we please.

And again:

We reached the conclusion that the enlarged program was necessary on the 30th day of July.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator understand from that statement of Gen. March that he believed that with 4,000,000 American soldiers on the battle front assisting the allies we could not only go through the line at any particular point, as the Germans went through the British line at a particular point, which was far from a victory, but he meant that we could go on to Berlin with our allies with a mere addition of 4,000,000 men to our forces?

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that I hardly know whether he meant that or not, but I think it is a fair implication from his language that we needed an army of 4,000,000 men in France, and that that in conjunction with the allies would be a force sufficient for us to furnish.

We have now in France 1,500,000 men. We have in the United States under arms, trained or in training, now 1,500,000 more, making a total of 3,000,000 already in or ready for your army of 4,000,000.

How many more may be procured by taking into the service under the draft law—this proposed law—men of 20 according to the figures submitted by Gen. Crowder and made a part of the report of the committee? Taking the ages from 32 to 45 and within those age limits he gives the total net effectives as 601,236, which, added to the 3,000,000, make 3,601,236.

But the amendment I have proposed permits the drafting of the men of 20 years. The tables do not show how many effectives of that age may be found, but for the ages 18 to 20 the number is given by Gen. Crowder as 1,797,609. I assume that the call for men of 20 years of age would yield one-half that number, or 898,804, or call it in round numbers 900,000. This, added to 3,601,236, gives a total of 4,501,236 men, or a half million more than, according to Gen. March, would be required to go through the German line wherever we pleased in France. So there you have an army of 4,000,000 men for France and a half million besides for service in other fields or for reserves.

But, Mr. President, this does not measure the forces we should be able to raise under a law changing the limits of the draft ages to 20 and 45 years for active service, leaving those under 20 to be called to training service only.

These figures, submitted as a part of the committee's report, on their face show an injustice, an unfair discrimination in favor of married men and against the agricultural interests of the country.

Look at the table on page 7 of the committee report. Total males in the ages from 32 to 40 is given as 6,960,532, of whom there are married 5,311,952, and who are put in deferred classification because they are married, I assume. But if this number is intended to represent only the married men who will be entitled to deferred classification because of dependent families, I insist that it is too large altogether.

But, Mr. President, it has been urged so often here on the floor that this includes all the married men that I can not now question it. They meant to say by this table that all married men were to have deferred classification.

How many married men between these ages themselves depend on the wife's labor or industry or on the business which belongs to her or on the wife's fortune, which they married? They will constitute a great class who can not claim the dependency of a single relative.

But aside from this, as a ground of exemption or deferred classification, how many men from the beginning of their married life have had a competency or have since acquired a competency for themselves and families, so that the family for its support now is not dependent on the labor or management of the husband at all, and he would be left free to do his part and to take his place among the armed forces necessary in this great war?

Now, Mr. President, out of this 6,960,532 between 32 and 40 the Provost Marshal General gets in net effectives the pitiable number of 448,086 men. He ought to get, and I believe any just and fair administration of the law would give him, at least 1,500,000 effective men instead of 448,086. It would give him this number of men—a million and a half—while between the ages of 32 and 45, the limits prescribed by the bill, he would get a proportionately larger number.

But allow now 1,500,000 as the number which could be reasonably raised between the ages of 32 and 45, and then add to that the 900,000 which the boys of 20 will furnish, and you will have, without touching the boy under 20, an additional force of 2,400,000 men; and this is 100,000 in excess of the number Gen. March says may be obtained under the law and which they expect to have in France by June 30, 1919. This force, added to the 3,000,000 already there and here ready to go there, would make a force of 5,400,000 instead of 4,000,000, who would "go through the German line wherever we pleased."

As showing something of the sentiment in regard to the deferred classification for married men, I desire to read an extract from a letter received from the chairman of one of our local drafting boards in South Dakota. He says:

I have noticed in the papers that the President says he wants the fact of a man being married to be sufficient grounds for deferred classification.

Gen. Crowder, evidently acting in accordance with that suggestion, has put all married men in deferred classification in these tables, and thus it is that out of the totals he produces such a small number of net effectives.

Then, says the chairman of this board in answer to this suggestion which he understands was made by the President:

This will never do, for we have men who have been married several years who have permitted their wives to work and really support them, and who are really worthless otherwise in the community. The same rules should apply to the new draft as we have had all along.

"This county of Tripp, which is one of the new counties of South Dakota, with a registration of 1,057, has sent 430 soldiers to the front, and Tom has come under the same rule that has governed Harry."

But, Mr. President, there is one interest that this proposed law ignores, and that is agriculture—and that, too, in face of the fact that "food will win the war," a manifesto we see everywhere on signboards, in the papers, electric-light displays, at the movies, "food will win the war"—and yet this bill and these estimates of the Provost Marshal General fail utterly to recognize the needs of the farmer. Look at the tables and note how very few are excepted for deferred classification because of industry, including agriculture.

I take the table in which he gives a list of the effectives between the ages of 19 and 20. Total males, 2,106,386, but the deferred classification solely for industry, including agriculture, is only 10,532, out of this great aggregate of 2,106,386. By the language of the table agriculture is included under the head of industry. How many is it intended shall be deferred for the purpose of agriculture purely? I go to the table giving the list of effectives between 32 and 45. The total number of males is 10,028,973, less married deferred 7,734,482, less deferred solely for industry and agriculture the pitiable number, compared with the whole aggregate and with the needs of agriculture, of 401,159.

Take 18 to 22. Total males, 3 171,671, less married deferred, 158,185, less deferred solely for industry and agriculture, mind, that includes every known essential industry, as well as agriculture, 15,858.

Mr. President, the evidence of the needs for men in agriculture in my own State of South Dakota, particularly—I can not speak so advisedly as to the conditions in other States, although I have a general understanding that the need is great everywhere—is simply overwhelming. I read from a letter dated August 16, written by Mr. Charles McCaffree, our State director of United States Employment Service. He says:

There have been no announcements or any communications concerning the matter of reduced fares for the harvest hands transported under the direction of the Employment Service.

This is significant for the reason that they are asking for harvest hands and help in thrashing through the Employment Service:

I have been wondering whether you secured any encouragement at all in the matter. We are getting by our harvest now, but it is not quite completed. We have a very great need for assistance for thrashing. This is brought to the office every day, but we can not get the men needed without a reduced rate. This stretch of territory is so remote from the best recruiting districts.

I read another letter from a farmer in my own county whom I know very well and on whose word and judgment I am accustomed to rely. Says the writer of this letter:

I wish you would use your influence, as far as possible, on the draft bill now pending before Congress, and see that they do not lower the draft age. It is going to be a hard blow to the western farmer if they take the boys between 18 and 21. The most of the farming is being done by the boys of these ages. Take it in my own precinct, at least half of the farmers in this vicinity would be left alone. I think the farmers of the West are as patriotic as anyone, but they do feel that these boys should be left at home until they are 21. I have talked with several Army officers, and they all tell me to keep the boys at home if possible until they are 21. If you think a petition signed by the voters of this vicinity would do any good, would be glad to secure one.

I will simply say that I have not encouraged the sending of a petition, although there is no question but what in any county in South Dakota the general sentiment would be as described by the writer of this letter.

As further indicating the situation and the needs of agriculture and the need to make better provision than has ever yet been made under the administration of the former law or is likely to be made under this law, I call attention to this telegram just received this morning from the Aberdeen Commercial Club:

ABERDEEN, S. DAK., August 23, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS STERLING,
Washington, D. C.:

Heavy rains here have caused shocked grain to sprout. Labor supply about 300 short. Seventy-five selected men due from our county Tuesday; mostly from farms. Will increase labor shortage. Will you use your influence to secure postponement of this quota? Will mean thousands of bushels of wheat saved.

And yet "food will win the war," and wheat is the kind of food which we are asked to supply over and above everything else.

Such is the situation in regard to farm labor in South Dakota. I shall hesitate to go and interview Gen. Crowder in regard to excusing the men of this quota badly as they may be needed. I have had some experience in regard to a former quota. I was simply told that if South Dakota did not wish to make default in her quota she must answer the call. In the activities of this war South Dakota is not of the defaulting kind. But this telegram and these letters express the need in that particular farming region where they raise the grain which of all other kind we most need to supply ourselves, our armies, and our devoted allies.

Mr. President, my amendment, it will be noticed, contemplates another class, too, than those necessary for farm work and farm operations. It contemplates the boys of 18 to 20 who ought to get some additional education at school or college. It provides—

That persons under the age of 20 years shall not be called into other than training service, and that periods of training for persons under such age shall be so prescribed as to least interfere with farm work or production on the part of those actually so engaged or with the attendance of duly registered and bona fide students at school or college.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Suppose the law provided that boys of 18, 19, and 20 years of age could enlist, does the Senator from South Dakota think that the boys of South Dakota would enlist?

Mr. STERLING. Very many of them would enlist, I will say to the Senator from Michigan; and I have thought, Mr. President, of advocating the idea that the boy from 18 to 20 years of age might be permitted to enlist if he so desired. I recognize the efficiency and the valor of a boy from 18 to 20 years of age and the truth of everything that has been said in regard to that; but, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will just excuse me one moment——

Mr. McCUMBER. I merely desire to ask the Senator if boys have not been allowed up to the present time to enlist at 18 years of age and above?

Mr. STERLING. I understand that they have been, but the recent order has prevented such enlistments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is not permissible now.

Mr. STERLING. But the one question in my mind has been as to whether there is not wisdom in the policy advocated by the Provost Marshal General in regard to having but the one system. I confess that I have some sympathy with the idea that soldiers should come in altogether under the selective-service law rather than be allowed voluntarily to enlist. There is no approbrium attached to the draft. We may thereby have, if I may so express it, a more harmonious system and one that gives better opportunity at least to recognize the needs of various industries than any dual volunteer and selective-draft system would give us. Hence, I have not here urged that boys from 18 to 20 should be permitted to enlist, although it is probable that many thousands of them would enlist.

I wish to call attention in that connection to another letter which I have received in regard to boys under 18 and the objection to a law that takes them into the actual service, whether or no, and without regard particularly to their mental development and equipment, even if physical requirements are met. This letter is from the dean of the college of medicine of the University of South Dakota and was only received on yesterday. He says:

Just a word to express my hope that the age limit for the selective-service draft will not be lowered to 18 years. You know I have three boys who are of draft age as the age limits now stand.

And I think, if I remember correctly, although the dean does not say so here, two of them are already in the service. One, a soldier, has visited me here at Washington—

And I have no fault to find with that; in fact, I am rather proud that such is the case. But if the age limit is reduced to 18, the draft will take my fourth boy, Harold. * * * While it is true that a large number of boys reach their full physical development at 18 or 19, it is also true that a very large number do not reach their full growth until they are 20 or 21. All my boys have been of that kind. It would be nothing less than a tragedy to put boys of that type into the Army at 18.

Not a tragedy simply because he is a boy of 18 years, but because he, like many of the best and strongest later, is at that age an undeveloped boy.

Mr. President, in addition to the agricultural industry, which will be served by not calling the boys between 18 and 20 into active military service or into service oversea, there are the advantages that will be afforded to those boys who desire and can acquire an education. It will give them the two-year period, from 18 to 20, during which they may attend school or college. Their vacations of three months each year will be spent in intensive military training. Oh, yes, Mr. President, I hear it urged here on the Senate floor that the experience a man will have by enlisting as a young man at 18 will in itself be a liberal education. I grant the educational value of service in an American Army and in a great cause such as that in which we are now engaged; its value can not be overestimated by the right-minded, aspiring young man of fine and high ideals of patriotism and of duty; but, Mr. President, I have heard more than one old soldier, a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, say that the one thing he deplored of all others in his experience as a young man was that he had by entering the service missed the education which he ought to have had in order to equip himself for the serious business of life or for a profession for which he believed he had some natural gift.

There, Mr. President, is the tragedy, sometimes in calling the young men of 18 into a long period of military service. These boys, who as old men I have heard express that regret, volunteered into the service, and they volunteered under a law and at a time when 20 years was the minimum age at which they could be drafted—during times of great stress in the War of the Rebellion. It is even worse when the boy desirous of an education—if there be no urgent need—instead of being allowed to volunteer is drafted into the service.

Mr. President, there are two armies necessary to the winning of this war. We are compelled to take both into consideration in considering this bill—the military army and the industrial army, which latter includes the farmer. The farmers of this country constitute the largest and most important part of the industrial army for the purposes of this war. From the beginning they have been admonished over and over again to increase production and they have responded nobly to the call; but by this bill it is proposed to further deprive them of the means of production.

Mr. President, I hope Senators will seriously consider this amendment, and I invite consideration of it too in view of the much-urged necessities of the case and in view of the desirability of making the war as short, sharp, and decisive for us as it is possible for America to make it. We shall be able to achieve our full part without yet at least drafting into overseas service the boys from 18 to 20. However, let it be remembered that my amendment does not exempt from the draft. It limits the service only. Under it the boy will be a well-trained soldier at 20, and be ready at once without further period of training for overseas duty, either in the field or in the trenches. How different this bill from our policy during the Civil War! The boy was not enrolled for any previous period of training. At 20 he went into the fighting service, but not before the age of 20. The amendment proposed makes him a trained soldier at 20. The time between 18 and 20 will not have been unemployed, but it will be all employed in the service of his country. Indeed, it will have been a strenuous life for him, for he will alternately serve as a farmer and as a soldier in training; but it will have been a continuous service.

Mr. President, I merely wish to add this word in conclusion. When I think of the actual need of men for the Army—and, in my opinion, the figures in the report of the committee demonstrate that need—and when I think, too, of the need of conserving our young manhood for needed work in industry and agriculture as well as for the duties of life and citizenship after the war, it seems to me that the system I here propose in connection with the other features of this bill will make the ideal system. It will in a large measure protect the industry on which the Army depends, and, rightly applied, will furnish all the men which our largest needs demand.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, having received such definite and concise information from the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs as to why, with hundreds of submarine chasers in our Atlantic ports, and with our battleships in every port along the Atlantic coast, it was impossible for us to overtake and catch a trawler running at a 10-knot speed, I shall not press the question any further, but shall proceed to the consideration of the pending subject.

Mr. President, I have received from farmers and others in my State letters of the same character as those which have been read by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], from our neighboring State. The conditions there are practically the same as they are in North Dakota, but, possibly, unlike some of the letters received by the Senator from South Dakota, the letters which I have received for the most part have been based upon the industrial rather than upon the sentimental aspects of the question. Labor is sorely needed on the farms. The excessively high wages paid and encouraged by the Government in all others industries, together with the leisurely method indulged in by those performing service in other governmental industries, have left no field from which the farmer can draw to secure the labor which is necessary to harvest his crops. It is, therefore, quite natural that he should ask that the draft be deferred at least until his crops shall have been harvested by his own boys who are old enough to do the work. But, Mr. President, I can not see that this situation can be remedied. It can only be temporarily relieved to some extent by deferring the draft call in the agricultural sections.

Our farmers, I believe, recognize that we need an Army of 5,000,000 men. I know that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] thinks we can get along with 4,000,000 men; the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and undoubtedly other Senators think that 4,000,000 will be as many as we will need, and they find support for their conclusions in the remarks of Gen. March; but I believe that we should have 5,000,000 men in France, and I believe that we should have them there just as quickly as it is possible to get them there.

Such an army, no matter where it is drawn, or at what age, will necessarily take just so many men out of the avenues of production. It makes no difference to us where we draw them from; we are drawing 5,000,000 men from the avenues of production. There is left, therefore, for us to decide only from what ages it is best to draw this number. If we do not take the boys between 18 and 21, Mr. President, we must draw this force from the men who are above that age. Which would it be better to take?

We all admit the necessity of continuing our industrial efforts not only to the extent to which they are now being put forth but far beyond that mark if it is possible to do so. Very few, indeed, of the younger men, the men of 18 to 21, have entered into the industrial lines; most of them have been attending school; most of them would still have to learn a trade, and, therefore, in drawing from the older men we would draw from those who are most needed, who are already skilled in industrial lines, and would have to fill their places by those who have had no experience at all along those lines.

Nor, Mr. President, is that all. We want to win this war with a minimum casualty list. We all agree to that. I fully appreciate the sentimental side of this question. A mother who sends her boy of 18 years to death must suffer agony indescribable; but does she suffer any more than the wife who sends her husband to death, who sends to the trenches to be slaughtered the father of her children? Is not the death of the latter as serious a loss as the death of the former? It is hard to make any character of distinction between the death of one individual and the death of another; but, Mr. President, while we can not make comparisons between the death of a son and the death of a husband, there is an element of chance that we never should lose sight of in determining which we should choose.

We want to win this war, I repeat, with the least possible number of deaths and casualties. We owe that to our soldiers; we owe it to the people of the country. It is probably true that in battle the number of wounded exceeds the number of killed—instantly killed, I will say—by nearly 10 to 1. Possibly under the newer methods of warefare the difference between the number of those killed and those wounded may be somewhat smaller than I have indicated. We can not save the one killed. We, then, become deeply concerned in saving the greater proportion of the other nine.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] who speaks from actual experience in war, have declared what is apparent to everyone, that the boy from 18 to 25 can stand greater hardships and can recuperate far more quickly than the man from 25 to 35. This is due in the most part to the recuperative quality of youth. The older man may be so worn out that he can not sleep even when opportunity is afforded, while the younger man entirely yields to this strength-reviving process of nature and awakens refreshed and invigorated.

I think those Senators, Mr. President, could have gone a step further and could have shown that of a given number of men between the ages of 18 and 25 and another equal number of men between the ages of 25 and 32, all equally seriously wounded, the death rate of the latter will be about 20 per cent greater than the death rate of the former. While this may not seem important when you consider only a company or a regiment, in the aggregate, in an army of 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 men, it means an enormous saving of life; it means the saving of the lives of hundreds of thousands of men.

We have heard arguments on the floor of the Senate by earnest and zealous Senators designed to establish the fact that we can secure a sufficient army without extending the draft age. Gen. March is quoted as declaring that if we had an army of 4,000,000 men on the battle line we could break through the German lines. Well, Mr. President, Gen. Byng broke through the German line without having such an army; the Germans broke through the British line and broke through the French line, but they did not thereby secure a victory in either case. However, Gen. March has never stated that with an army of 4,000,000 Americans we could plant the American flag over the castle of the Hohenzollerns; he has never made such an intimation; he has simply stated that by concentrating with the forces of our allies and having at our command 4,000,000 men we could break through any particular section or line of the German defense we saw fit. Well, that will not win the war. I repeat, Mr. President, that nothing short of planting our flag in Berlin is going to win this war as we ought to win it—win it so conclusively that we can dictate the terms of peace which were so eloquently portrayed by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on yesterday.

I agree with every one of the terms he outlined, Mr. President, but I do not agree that his suggestions cover all of the terms that we ought to demand. If a man breaks into my house, burns it down, and murders members of my family, you can not satisfy my sense of justice by saying to him: "Get off these premises; go back home." That does not restore my murdered children or rebuild my destroyed home. That is not the German way of making peace terms where she has triumphed. Let us stop for a moment to ask ourselves, What would Germany do if she should be victorious in this war? What did she do in 1870, when she made a war on a nation wholly unprepared? She took from France two of her fairest Provinces, and then she immediately levied a tribute of a billion dollars upon her and has never forgiven herself for that leniency. What has Germany done in every Province that she has conquered in this war? She has bled it white; she has made slaves of the population. Are we going to be satisfied with a peace that shall say to Germany, "Go back into Germany and we will stop the war"? No, Mr. President; the American people will never allow the Senate to vote for a peace of that kind. We have declared what the terms of our peace shall be, and the two most important conditions, the two brightest stars in the firmament of our peace declarations, are restitution and reparation. Germany can not return the lives of those whom she has brutally murdered; but she can pay in part the damages which she has caused by forcing upon an unprotected and unprepared world such a barbarous war. We can not bring back to life the little nurse, Edith Cavel, who was brutally murdered in defiance of every principle of humanity and every rule of civilized warfare, because some British prisoners escaped from a Belgian hospital. We can not compel Germany to give back the life of Capt. Fryatt, who as a prisoner was foully murdered because he was brave enough to defend himself against the U boat; we can not compel her to return to life the prisoners she tortured to death, the prisoners who were compelled by her

U boat to stand without life preservers on the outer deck while the vessel submerged and drowned them; we can not compel her to return to mothers the infants whom they have savagely slaughtered; but we never ought to sign a peace pact until there has been an unconditional surrender and that unconditional surrender has compelled Germany to deliver up these murderers to the hands of an international board for justice.

Every officer who commanded or allowed the atrocities, every soldier who cut off the arms or legs of a little child, should be delivered up and shot. We never ought to agree to a peace until we have taught the military autocracy who encouraged these crimes and taught the world that no such atrocities as those that have been practiced in this war can ever be practiced again in any other war, if unhappily another war shall again curse this old earth of ours.

But, Mr. President, let us not be misled by the success of our armies and those of our allies upon the western front into too great expectations. That success is most gratifying; that success has dispersed the gloom that pervaded this country at the close of the two great German drives which were inaugurated on March 21; but with all our success we have not nearly accomplished what the German drives accomplished between March 21 and the day those drives were checked and broken by the French and British Army. Those drives netted the Germans in prisoners alone nearly 200,000 allied soldiers. The late reports claim that so far we and our allies have taken about 100,000 prisoners, or about half the number that were taken by the Germans in their two drives.

The present reports indicate that we have taken guns, great and small, less than one-half the number we lost in the German drives, and less than a quarter of the war material that they obtained from us in those drives. And why, Mr. President, were those German drives so effective? Because we were grossly outnumbered—outnumbered at every battle during that drive, all the way from two to five times the number that we could place against the German onslaught. The encouraging part of this last battle to me is that it has demonstrated that on equal terms, with equal numbers of men, with equally favorable conditions, the allied armies where the battle is now progressing are to-day superior in quality and in every respect, man for man, to the armies of the central powers; and if you could give them the opportunity to fight squarely in the open, with the old Anglo-Saxon idea of fair play, the war would be of short duration. The superiority of the central powers has been in the murderous gas, in greater numbers, in their liquid fire, and in a thousand other hellish devices which they have contrived to meet their enemies in an underhanded and cowardly way.

But, Mr. President, I can not blind my eyes to the fact that back of these German lines all the way to Berlin are fortress after fortress, trench after trench, already completed, which will enable them to retreat into their own country, disputing inch by inch every mile from the Rhine to Berlin; and in the present offensive warfare I am inclined to think that the losses in number of men killed are about equal. Our gain alone is in the prisoners taken. What we need, Mr. President, is an army of such numbers that we can drive forward more rapidly than it will be possible for the enemy to retreat, taking with him his supplies.

Mr. President, we have heard so much about what Gen. March has said with reference to the number of men that will be sufficient to break through the German line that I think I am excusable in quoting, without giving the name, the words of one of our American generals, acknowledged by all to be the greatest American general—one who is not to-day in active service in France, but is well known to you all; and this is what he said to me:

We need upon the western front—

And it was after he had returned from France—

5,000,000 men on the fighting line. We should have back of that line 1,500,000 men in training in France. We should have, back of them, 2,000,000 men in training in the United States.

That makes 8,500,000 men. That is the estimate of a general who has been on the battle front and understands the situation, and who is talking not of breaking through the German line wherever we see fit but of winning this war and winning it, as we ought to, in the shortest possible time.

The other day, Mr. President, I received from a major now serving in France a letter, excerpts from which I am going to ask the Secretary to read. I will ask that those portions which I have marked may be read, because he is giving us the view of the men and the officers in France as to what the American people ought to do, and he is giving it after having visited every portion of the line. I will say that both the name of the general and the name of this major I have omitted, because it is probable that their views might disagree with those of the Secretary of War, and therefore I would not wish to give publicity to their names; but I ask that the marked portions of the letter may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

MY DEAR SENATOR MCCUMBER: It is now nearly a year since I came to France with my regiment, and though I would enjoy a good long talk with you, if it should cover just a little of the vast array of new and unusual experiences I have had it would be a long and probably tiresome one indeed.

The American soldier is ever resourceful in frolic or fight, and in his efficiency, ready capability, and world-astounding adaptability has surpassed and often surprised himself. He is a constant source of wonderment, too, and has won the unqualified and openly expressed admiration of the finest fighters of the oldest armies now in Europe. His perennial kindness, his never-fading good cheer, his undiminishing "pep," and his spontaneous eagerness to "take a chance," no matter what the odds against him, and the fact that he always "gets away with it" have won for him the reputation of being the most modest and best soldier now fighting in Europe. He is just exactly the sort of soldier to completely dissolve the morale of the enemy, and by his alertness takes immediate advantage of the fatigue or mistakes of the enemy. We have nothing but unstinted praise for all of our allies, but they are war weary; their enthusiasm is blunted by four years of preparing with one hand while fighting with the other an enemy not only overwhelming in numbers but unscrupulous in means and methods.

You already know what our boys have accomplished since they have entered the trenches, especially during the last week. Side by side with the French, who love them like brothers, they have beaten the Hun at his own game and pursued him without pause until they have recovered all that was lost in the last big German push through the French sectors, and they are still after them. This ability to, after starting the Hun, to keep him on the run, if kept up, will soon win the war; but the soonness depends upon our ability to keep him going. The war has lasted as long as it has because the allies have only had the ability to "hold him," or, if conditions have favored a counter-attack, the pursuit of him was limited in length and he was always given time to dig in. Such methods were unavoidable and due to no lack of valor on the part of our brave allies. It must be different now; our lines must be kept fresh and reserves and supplies must come so fast and in such numbers that the enemy will be given no time to recoup or reform his lines, until he will be rolled back demoralized, and to the very gates of Berlin.

* * * * * * *

I see your name so frequently mentioned in connection with the desire for sending over here an army of unlimited magnitude that this letter is written largely for the purpose of telling you that you exactly express the wants and needs of the present situation. The number should be overwhelming, so that the usual winter rest which has every year been accorded the Boche, and of which he has taken such costly advantage, will be denied him this year. And we not only need the numbers, but need now some bold and dependable pronouncement of the unlimited millions to come, advertised so loudly that it will give a solid and lasting encouragement to our tired but courageous allies, and reach to the remote regions of Germany with crushing emphasis. Such an announcement coming from the highest places would strike terror to the whole Prussion régime, which already glimpses its defeat.

* * * * * * *

The larger the army the fewer lives it will cost to win the war, and the bolder the announcement the easier the enemy is prepared for quick and complete defeat, and the sooner will come peace with victory. You have always seen clearly and right. I have just returned from an inspection of 48 camps, and I know just how a large part of the Army feels. The time for secrecy is past. We are in a position now to do big things; and telling it frankly and in the proper manner will not only stimulate their accomplishment, but shatter the morale of the enemy to such a degree that maybe a lot of it won't have to be done. In the face of what our own boys have already done over here, such advertising will not be regarded as boasting.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, when we had the bill before us just prior to our unanimous-consent agreement—which I think was on the 13th of July—I introduced an amendment to the then pending measure providing that we should say to the world, and that we should say to Germany, that we intend to put at least 5,000,000 men in the field in the quickest possible time. I stated that that ought to be placed in our legislation for the purpose of giving encouragement to our soldiers battling upon the western front, and discouragement to the enemies who are battling against them. This letter responds to that sentiment, and shows that it is the sentiment of officers and soldiers battling in France. But, Mr. President, for some unaccountable reason—and I think the only possible reason was that this amendment originated in the Senate, and did not originate in one of the departments—it was thought best to kill it, and, of course, it suffered the execution that has been accorded to everything that has not received its O. K. first from the departments.

Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], in speaking about this trawler and the fact that we had actually dropped depth bombs over the U-boat, stated that he was informed, if I understood him rightly, that the bombs were dropped all right and that the U-boat was clearly seen all right, but that the bombs did not explode, but he did not feel that he was at liberty to inform the American people why they did not explode. I think the American people are entitled to know why they did not explode. It is through this knowledge that we will assure ourselves of having those that will explode. I do not believe that there is anything gained by hiding anything concerning this war from the American people. We will meet the emergency. We will get our airships all the sooner because the American people have been informed of the awful squandering of the tax-paid money of the American public with no results. The airship board says to Congress: "Give us another chance." Well, we are going to give them another chance to produce these airships; but if they had told us what they were doing in the very beginning, if they had kept us informed of what they were not doing during the whole year they were burning up nearly a billion dollars, we would have been a great deal further on our way toward securing the necessary airships for service in Europe to-day.

Mr. President, we must conduct this war on the theory that the central powers will fight as long as they have power to fight, and that this war will last two or three years longer. The principal reason that justifies us in saying that the war will last at least two years is that it will take us at least two years before we can get fully into it at the rate we are now progressing; and if we win this war sooner than that it will be because of the wonderful fighting qualities of the Americans who are over there, and of our allies, who are carrying the principal burden of this conflict. It is our duty to save the lives of as many of our allies as we possibly can as well as the lives of our own soldiers. We can save them only by rushing our troops to the front in overwhelming numbers; and our fatalities, we know, will be fewer in number by sending the younger men, who can stand the fatigue that is imposed upon our soldiers in France.

Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has introduced an amendment to compel those who have taken advantage of the privileges of a deferred classification because their services were needed in the industries to surrender this privilege if they fail to continue their work. The amendment is right so far as it goes. There can be no just argument against it.

Every American capable of working or fighting ought to be doing one or the other, and he ought to be doing it to the very best of his ability. But, Mr. President, I predict that but very little benefit will come from this amendment, even if it passes, and I will tell the Senator why.

The Senator, in his remarks, struck the keynote of the whole question when he stated that just in proportion to the increase in wages there had been a decrease in efficiency; and no one will deny to-day that while we are conducting this most desperate warfare individual energy, individual efficiency, has absolutely decreased from 35 to 50 per cent. That certainly is a bad situation; and therein, Mr. President, lies our principal trouble. That is why we have not the ships; that is why we have not the steel to build the ships; that is why we have not the guns; that is why we have not the ammunition; that is one of the reasons, though undoubtedly a minor reason, why we have not the airplanes; and all these together are the reasons why we have not the men in France that we ought to have to-day.

I called attention yesterday to what I regarded as the shameful manner in which work for the Government is being conducted under our very eyes. If any Senator will step outside this Capitol—any Senator who knows what real physical work is—and for five minutes will watch the time-killing methods adopted in the construction of these buildings he will understand why we are so shamefully behind in our war efforts. The Government to-day is entitled to the best energy and efforts of every man and woman in the land, and we should put every man, woman, and child who is able to perform any service for the Government under military control, and demand of each that he do his whole duty. If we have the right to enlist and drive our American citizens over the top, in the face of gas and liquid flame, the field gun and artillery; if we have the right to drive them to their deaths, then I want to ask any Senator if we have not the same right to ask their brothers here at home to do an honest day's work to support those boys? I want to ask those Senators if we should stand idly by and see the vast number of aliens, who are to-day the disturbing element, who are to-day doing most of the slacking in our work, remaining here under the protection of this Government, receiving wages ten and twenty times what they ever received before—employed for the very purpose of speeding up and being paid these enormous wages to insure such speeding up—if we should stand idly by and allow them to defeat our war purposes by giving us 30 to 40 per cent efficiency for these exceptionally high wages? By allowing this are we not committing a grievous offense against our soldier boys? Are we not responsible for the thousands and hundreds of thousands who will be killed in this war because of our delay?

I saw the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] in the Chamber a moment ago. I notice that he is absent now; but I wanted at this time to read to him a clipping from the Washington Times of to-day which will support his theory that there ought not to be any strikes during the continuance of this war. We have constituted organizations that will see to it that no injustice is done any laborer, and he can trust his case to those boards and continue to perform his services until such board can act on his complaint.

I stated yesterday, in describing the character of work that was being done in the shadow of this Capitol, that I would to God that the soldier battling all day long in France, and digging himself in all night long, could for a moment look at the charter of work that is being done to support him and to support his brothers on the line of battle. I am supported in that declaration by this publication which brings before us to-day the view taken by our soldiers on these strikes. The news article is from the Washington Times of to-day and reads as follows:

FORT M'HENRY TROOPS ANGERED BY STRIKE.

BALTIMORE, August 2.

Soldiers at United States General Hospital No. 2, Fort McHenry, were enraged when 54 bricklayers employed on hospital buildings walked out because their demands for increased pay had not been granted.

The men are now being paid 75 cents an hour—

That is, for eight hours a day; and if they work an additional two hours they are paid a half more; and if they work on Sunday—which nearly all of them do, and then cut out Monday—they receive $1.50 an hour for their work on Sunday—and some time ago asked for an increase to $1 an hour.

The soldiers were of the opinion that these men should be immediately drafted and put to work again at $1 a day instead of a dollar an hour.

The foreman explained that they would not get the increase any sooner by striking and it might result in them losing their positions.

There has just been handed me another article, headed as follows:

Two thousand plumbers on Government work go out on strike. Men employed at all camps and Government operations on both sides of Hampton Roads quit work. Big increase in pay asked. Want increase from 75 cents per hour to 87½ cents, with other concessions. Chairman of committee will have nothing to say.

Mr. President, I think no stronger arguments could be made in favor of the amendment that is offered by the Senator from Colorado than are contained in these published statements. I think we all know something about plumbers' wages. We all know something about the profits in them; and we know that plumbers receiving 75 cents an hour, with higher wages for overtime, certainly have no just or moral right to strike, while our boys are battling for $1 a day in the trenches. It ought not to be allowed. Any man who does it, knowing its consequences to our soldiers, is not loyal, and any statesman who stands by without voicing his protest, to say the least, is lacking in courage, if not in fidelity, to the country.

Mr. President, I tell you the American people want every man from 65 years down who can perform an honest day's labor to perform it, and they will back this Congress and they will back this Government if we will enforce it. The country demands, our soldiers at the front demand, humanity demands that we do the very best that we can in winning this war and winning it in the shortest possible time.

But I admit we can not put 5,000,000 men over there to-day, because we need 30,000,000 tons dead weight of shipping to transport and to maintain an army of 5,000,000 men. We need that in addition to the shipping we now have. Are we going to get it either in 1918 or 1919? We were promised by the Shipping Board in 1917 that they would construct from six to eight million dead weight tonnage during the year 1918. They have delivered to-day, or up to August 1, about 1,470,000 dead-weight tons, but of this there were requisitioned ships built or in building amounting to 1,224,000 dead weight tonnage, leaving to the credit of the Shipping Board in actual new construction about 246,000 tons dead weight. Now, that is your shipping situation.

Last year the U-boats disposed of over 10,000,000 dead-weight tons. In the first seven months of this year, 1918, they have disposed of 3,500,000 tons dead-weight.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator stated, as I understood him, that it would require 30,000,000 tons of shipping to supply an army of 5,000,000 men.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; dead-weight tons.

Mr. FLETCHER. Dead-weight. I do not quite follow the Senator in his calculation. I suppose he is basing that on the idea that it requires 6 tons to the man per annum. Six tons per annum would mean that you would need 30,000,000 tons of shipping per annum, but when you figure that a ship will require not only 90 days to make a return trip, but will make three trips at least a year, it would be 10,000,000 tons, would it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. What I mean is this: That if we have an Army in France of 5,000,000 men it will require the constant use of 30,000,000 tons of shipping carrying men to take their places, carrying ammunition and supplies, even without taking into account the number that will go down to the bottom of the ocean through ordinary marine disaster and through the U-boats. That is the information I have, and that is the information which appears in your committee hearing. I forget which one of your expert witnesses testified and stated that it would be about that. He gave the number, however, in gross tonnage, which reduced to the dead tonnage would be about 6 tons.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think it would require the constant use of 30,000,000 tons of shipping to take care of 5,000,000 men. I will admit it will require that much to be used in a year, undoubtedly.

Mr. McCUMBER. The British report was that it took 7 tons per man during their war in South Africa. That is equivalent to 7 tons in actual use.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the later estimate was 6 tons per man.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, Mr. President, that is our present shipping situation. The chairman of the Shipping Board says we will secure ships enough to win this war. Oh, yes, that is true; but he did not tell us when. To win this war when, Mr. Hurley? The question the American people want to know is how soon you can produce the shipping that will take care of from five to six or seven million men. Of course, we will win the war. We will win it if it takes us 40 years to do it, but we will win it sooner and we will win it with fewer, vastly fewer casualties and deaths if we send over enough men and if we produce the shipping to take care of that number of men. In the meantime while you are getting these ships ready hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of brave boys will die, will be killed, because of our neglect.

Now, we ought to hurry matters up. We ought first to provide for an army of at least 5,000,000, and I would say 7,000,000, and then we ought to concentrate all our energies toward the production of shipping and other material to take that army over and to support them. The way we can do it and the way we ought to do it is not to conscript labor, but to conscript the manhood and the womanhood and the childhood, if necessity demands it, of our American people. We have got the mills, we have got the steel, we have got everything we need in raw material to meet the demand; but if the productive energy of the American people is going to be allowed to be reduced from 100 per cent efficiency to 60 and 70 per cent efficiency, there is a duty upon the part of the American Congress that ought to be performed.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I only want a moment and in that moment mainly to talk to the RECORD. I came to the Senate yesterday expecting a vote on the pending measure either yesterday or to-day and was very anxious that I might be recorded in its favor. I find myself obliged to leave to-night for my own State in response to some of the obligations that come to a man in public and political life, and I therefore want the RECORD to say that I would very gladly and whole-heartedly vote for this measure.

I am not deeply concerned about any of the pending amendments, and I say that without disparaging the merits thereof in any way. I think the bill ought to pass. I am in favor of the committee's bill. I accept it without reservation. I put aside my personal sympathies, some of my own notions of the righteousness of universal service, to accept that which the War Department thinks necessary for the winning of the war. I would very gladly vote for the bill, because, in my own judgment, the speedy passage of this measure and its speedier application is going to save the Nation millions in treasure and thousands in lives.

It is going to do more than that. It is my conviction that we are so adrift in this Republic to-day in the fever of war and the attendant conditions abnormal to our American life that unless it is speedily brought to a triumphant ending the cost of the aftermath will be infinitely more than the winning of the war.

I do not think the Republic has yet taken the part it ought in bringing about a victory for world civilization and its preservation. I think we ought to have armies of many millions and I think that the conscience of the Republic will impel a reclassification of men enrolled and commit the man power of this country to the winning of the war, no matter what the sacrifice may be in the industrial life of the Republic.

So, Mr. President, I just want the RECORD to say, first, that I find my presence unnecessary. The bill is sure to have the sanction of this body, but in my absence from the roll call which is to be had I want it known that I gladly give my voice to the enactment of the measure.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, if my rising upon this occasion would defer for a moment the vote upon this bill I would not have a word to say. However, upon the assurance of the chairman that the bill will not likely come to a vote this afternoon and that my action will not delay a vote, I desire to offer first an amendment to the committee's bill, on page 6, which I will ask to have read that it may go into the RECORD and may be printed. I offer it now for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico offers an amendment, which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. Amend paragraph 7, on line 14, page 6, as follows:

Strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the words: "and such person shall be entitled to the same rights under the homestead and other land and mineral entry laws, general or special, as those over 21 years of age now possess under said laws: Provided, That any requirements as to establishment of residence within a limited time shall be suspended as to entry by such person until six months after his discharge from military service."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the amendment speaks for itself. It needs but little explanation. It simply extends the right of land and mineral entries to the drafted man of 18 possessed now by the citizen of 21. There is a requirement of the homestead law that residence shall be made upon a homestead so applied for within six months after the application is made. Of course, if a drafted man had a right of entry he could not make his residence within the period unless he was discharged prior thereto.

Mr. President, when I offered in June the amendment to the Army appropriation bill at that time and kept the amendment in various forms before the body for several days, securing votes upon the proposition to increase and decrease the age limit of the drafted men as is provided exactly in terms in this bill, modifying it, and securing votes upon the proposition when the first was defeated to make the ages 20 and 40, I introduced the amendment in perfect good faith, because it was as apparent to all of us then who had given any thought to the subject as it is now that so long as the present rules and regulations and classifications with reference to drafted men are enforced as they have been drawn and are being enforced by the War Department, if it is necessary to raise an additional number beyond the number we now have in the service, an additional reservoir must be supplied. That was as apparent in June as it is now, and I congratulate the country upon the fact that the Senate has been brought to a realization of the necessity.

Mr. President, the Senate knows very well from repeated expressions of my opinions that I have believed in the constitutional duty of the Congress of the United States, as expressly set forth in the Constitution itself, to itself provide the rules and the regulations for governing any army raised or authorized to be raised by Congress. The Constitution is specific in its terms. We are not only authorized but, in my judgment, directed by the strict terms of the Constitution to ourselves enact by legislation the regulations and the rules governing even the disciplining of any military force which can be raised under the authority of the Constitution.

When the draft measure was first up, more than a year ago, I discussed this subject as I am now discussing it. Congress in its wisdom saw best, at the request of the administration, to delegate the authority to the Secretary of War or the Commander in Chief of the Army to classify the recruits or the drafted men and to himself put in force such regulations and rules as the War Department or its advisers might adopt. They have adopted such rules and regulations and classifications as to preclude the possibility of securing another man unless the draft ages are now raised or lowered. In so far as that necessity now arises, the responsibility is between the Congress and the administration, equally divided. The Congress, in my judgment, has shirked its duty in not providing the rules itself. Unless Congress goes back and performs its duty and changes the classification or changes the rules and regulations with reference to the classification of these men, unless Congress itself does what, in my judgment, it should have done in the beginning, more than a year ago, then Congress is compelled to decrease and increase the draft age. For this reason I offered the amendment which created so much discussion and which was not only voted down but every proposition in connection with it was voted down by this body in June.

For the reasons then given, which I have not seen fit to change at all and which I am glad are now concurred in by the War Department as they were then disagreed from, I propose to vote for this bill. If we do not provide more men in the trenches we will not win this war, in my judgment. The War Department have concluded that we must have more men. They have stated frankly what they propose to do with the men, and Congress must provide some method of securing the men for the purposes needed. The present proposition is the only one which will be presented unless Congress decides to take in its own hands the matter of classifying those now under registration.

I can not understand, I will say frankly, the argument of my distinguished friend the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] who would vote against the proposition that a slacker in work should be forced to fight, as is proposed by the amendment of the committee, when he admits 4,000,000 men must be provided for, and yet he will not go with us to provide the only reservoir from which the man power may be drawn.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. The difference between the Senator and myself is that according to my view of the figures which have been presented it is not necessary to go to the age of 18 in order to get the 4,400,000 men. In order to reduce it to the point where they must go to the 18-year-old men they arbitrarily exclude from the 10,800,000 men a much larger number than in my judgment is necessary.

I do not wish to be understood for a moment as opposing the sending of 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 men to Europe. I differ with the able Senator from New Mexico as to the necessity of sending the 18-year-old boy, because I believe that there are plenty of men between 32 and 45 to make up the list.

Mr. FALL. There is no difference between the Senator and myself, except that I insist unless the Senator and a majority of the Congress will join me in reclassifying we can not get the men. So long as he yields to the classification as established by the War Department he can not get the men.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho will be delighted to join the Senator in a reclassification, but unfortunately, or fortunately perhaps, the Senator from Idaho is not a member of the Military Affairs Committee, and did not frame this bill and could only speak to the bill as it was presented to the Senate. But the able Senator from New Mexico, who is much more competent to deal with this subject than myself, can present no amendment here for a reclassification that the Senator from Idaho will not support.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I am glad to know that. Upon some other occasion I think the question will undoubtedly be raised in the Senate. Not being a member of the Military Affairs Committee myself I could only point out what I thought were the objection to the provision in the original draft bill. I did not assume then, immediately after the declaration of war, when it was so necessary that we should have an army of some kind and when it was so insisted upon by the administration that it should be only in a certain way, that we should delegate the power to classify it and to exempt to the administration rather than to provide ourselves how these exemptions and classifications should be made. When it was so necessary, as I said, immediately after the declaration of war to provide a method by which an army should be assembled the Senator from New Mexico, not being a member of the Military Affairs Committee, offered no direct amendment but simply made suggestions, which were not listened to then so much as they were listened to in June, when he offered the amendment which is now the provision pending in the bill with the approval of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. As the Senator from New Mexico knows, I agree with him entirely with regard to the duty of Congress in raising an army, but I assume he does not doubt that the President, through his proper officer, could reclassify the men who have been hitherto included within the draft age, and that they could present an entirely different classification for the men whom we are about to bring within the draft age. I assume there will be no doubt of that. If we must have the men—and I think we should have 4,000,000 and many more, for that matter—and if the administration is denied the privilege of getting 18-year-old boys, it will be compelled to reclassify, because it must have the men.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, in part I agree with the construction of the draft law, as just referred to by the Senator from Iowa. In part I am afraid I must disagree with him. Congress enacted this law—I have the draft law in my hand:

> And the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes.

Now, there is a classification specified by the Congress itself in this act which under one construction the President might be precluded from touching except for semimilitary purposes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from New Mexico and myself differ with regard to that, but——

Mr. FALL. Then as to the other draft classification I think we agree.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is, of course, aware of the fact that a very large proportion of the men who have been put in the deferred classes were put there because they are married and have in some fashion or other somebody dependent upon their labor. We have in the deferred classes all the State officers and all the county officers, although I think we did that partially in the law.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will permit me right here, that is the classification I had reference to. I think the Senator and myself thoroughly agree.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so.

Mr. FALL. As to the other classification not specially mentioned here, those drafted for partial military service, I agree that the President has the right to-day to reclassify them.

Mr. CUMMINS. Eighty per cent of the men of draft age substantially have been put in deferred classifications because they are married and have in some degree dependents.

Mr. FALL. I am not familiar with the exact figures, but I accept those suggested by the Senator. As I said, I think we are in thorough agreement in our construction of the law as it stands; but, Mr. President, to use a hackneyed phrase, this is a condition and not a theory which confronts us. Shall I refrain from voting for the passage of this bill because the War Department refuses to reclassify, when we all admit we must have the men? Shall I not perform my duty to the best of my ability, whether I can perform it in the exact way which would suit me best or not?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose we should cut out the 18 and 19 year old boys, that would probably compel a reclassification.

Mr. FALL. It might.

Mr. BORAH. Then, I do not see how a man is not doing his duty according to the lights which are before him if he votes to cut out 18 and 19, and it compels a reclassification, when he is in favor of a reclassification. I am in favor of a reclassification. I arrive at that by two opposites. First, I cut out the 18 and 19 year age, and, secondly, I force a reclassification. That is precisely what I want.

Mr. FALL. Of course the Senator knows well that what I said was no reflection upon him or upon any other Senator who might disagree with me, nor was it so intended. I was simply expressing my own conviction as to my own thought as to what is actuating me in the matter, that we are confronted by a condition, and I will either attack that condition directly by compelling by law a reclassification, or, if I can not do that, under the necessities of the moment I shall attempt to supply some other reservoir from which the necessary number of soldiers may be obtained with which to win this war. I agree with the Senator, and he agrees with me, that if he and I could rewrite the bill or write a provision into it we would compel a reclassification.

We would compel the War Department to take from those now registered an additional number of men; but unfortunately his experience, I presume, has been as mine, that we were unable to compel action of that character or to secure a sufficient number of votes in this body with which to compel such action. We have thus been in the position of seeing ourselves—or I have, at least—compelled to wait two or three months to have carried out by the suggestion of the War Department a proposition the necessity for which was so perfectly plain, simple, and apparent two months ago that there could be no discussion about it, except that the War Department was not ready for it, so long as we allowed the law as it was written and the rules, regulations, and classifications made under that law to remain as they stand to-day.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow another suggestion?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. CUMMINS. I make it because I would not have it understood that anything that I have said or any inference from anything that I have said could be interpreted as a criticism upon the Provost Marshal General. The classification which is now in force was made, I assume, with reference to the number of men intended to be raised for the Army. I do not think that any Provost Marshal General or any Secretary of War would ever have made the classification that we have before us if the purpose had been to raise five millions of men. The officers did not intend to raise any such army, I assume, because they thought it was not needed; and I would be very sorry to believe that, with the emergency that is now apparent, they would not be perfectly willing and glad to revise the classification so that the requisite number of men could be raised from it.

Mr. FALL. Well, Mr. President, I have understood that this bill was here because they had refused to revise the classifications. I have understood that the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, who have been before the committees of both Houses, have decided upon this plan, and, rather than do what they could do themselves without any demand upon Congress, have demanded that Congress lower and raise the age limit, although they themselves, as the Senator has said, have now the power to reclassify without further act of Congress.

Mr. President, as I have said, that forms the condition with which we are confronted; but their failure to reclassify, as I think they should do, and thus provide a sufficient number of men to fill the quota at present required offers no excuse for me, at any rate, to refuse to vote for this measure and say that the responsibility then is upon them to reclassify.

Mr. President, I think that the very fact referred to by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], that at the time this classification was made the officers making it did not contemplate the raising of a large number of men, is, as he says, at the root of the trouble. Still, I think that that very fact constitutes a very grave reflection upon the wisdom of this body and the wisdom of those administering the law.

The draft law, as I have pointed out heretofore, and as I pointed out when it was here before us for passage, was a limitation upon the fighting force of the United States, although it pretended upon its face to be an emergency measure to provide all the man power necessary with which to win the war. As I pointed out again in connection with the Army appropriation bill which was brought in here in June, to which I offered the draft amendment, again, in the face of the declaration of the President of the United States that there should be no limit upon the number of men who should be placed at his command, that legislation was in itself a limitation on the number of men to 3,000,000, and no more. The bill we have before us now, even going into the home and taking boys of 18 and going into the business houses and taking men of 45, itself is avowedly a limitation upon the man power to be placed at the disposal of the President of the United States with which to fight this war. According to the evidence presented and under the statements made here by Senators who have this matter in charge, the Army now is to be limited to 4,000,000 men. While Gen. Wood and men of that character have for three, four, or five years been clamoring for at least 5,000,000 men, we limit the number to be raised under this draft to not more than one and a half million men in addition to those covered by the original bill. Then, while pretending to remove the limit, under the last bill, which was passed in June, under the rules and regulations provided and under the testimony—which must be taken as a part of the history of this legislation, and under which it must be construed—we specifically again limited, as I say, the armed forces of the United States under the draft measure to 3,000,000. Now, under the same rule of construction and by direct wording, we are limiting the military forces of the United States, including volunteers and all those under the draft, to 4,000,000 men.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and other Senators who have avowed that they were satisfied with the program, because they were guided by the advice of the authorities, are right and I am wrong, they are justified in their contention; of course, ordinarily, we should be able to place absolute confidence in the plans and the program offered us by our War Department; but, Mr. President, while I may be wrong, I yet find myself, with reference to this very bill, in exactly the same frame of mind which I avowed here in interpellating the chairman of the committee and the Senator from New York in June last, when the chairman stated that, while he favored the proposition which I had introduced, and which was then pending, to make the draft ages 18 to 45, yet, in view of the statements of the Secretary of War and his Chief of Staff, he would vote against it for the time being. You will remember that then—and it is in the RECORD—I stated that, in view of the declaration of the Secretary of War that, with 750,000 troops then in France, we were six months ahead of his program, he necessarily, by his own declaration, must be six months behind the crisis in his plan, and that I, for one, would decline to take his advice or to abide by it until he caught up with the crisis. I am in the same frame of mind now, sir. While I shall vote for this bill, I am yet not satisfied that the plans of the honorable Secretary of War are not more than six months behind the necessities of the occasion.

Mr. President, I have really said more than I intended to say. I shall vote for this bill; I shall vote for any measure—and I beg of the Military Committee that they will give us an opportunity to vote for some such measure—which will compel the War Department to reclassify those who are subject to military duty.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I shall vote for this bill for reasons which may be very briefly stated. I shall vote for it because the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, and the War Department say that it is a necessary measure. It is not, in my opinion, a question of putting confidence in the judgment of the War Department in all things; but somebody must be charged with the responsibility of framing a war policy; somebody must be charged with the responsibility of raising the Army; and this is the method that has been adopted and which has been recommended by the War Department.

Not only is that true, but the Secretary of War and his Chief of Staff, both of whom were examined and interrogated at length before the Committee on Military Affairs, have expressed it as their judgment that nothing short of this will suffice to raise an army of the size required to carry out the program of the department. For that reason, Mr. President, if for no other, I shall vote to give them what they ask. If I were to consult my sentiments I should vote against sending boys of 18 to the colors. That may sound strange coming from the lips of one who, like myself, has been from the first so strong an advocate of universal military training. I have for years been very much in favor of universal military training. Several months ago I offered an amendment to a bill then pending before this body by the terms of which I sought to have that system adopted. I did that at that time, Mr. President, for the reason that some of us thought at least that we foresaw the very emergency which has now arisen. I remember very well—and the RECORD will bear me out—that in addressing myself to that measure I then said if it were not adopted at that time I felt certain that we should be called upon to vote for that or a more drastic measure before this session of Congress expired. Here it has now come to pass. This is, indeed, a very much more drastic proposition than the one which was then advanced.

I will go further, Mr. President, and say that I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is right in thinking that there have been mistakes made in the classifications in the past. I think that the deferred classes contain the names of many who should not be on those lists, and I believe that before we reach the end there must be a change in that as well; I think that we shall go into them; but at this time, for the reason given by the authorities upon whom responsibility must rest, that this measure as now framed is an absolute necessity for the success of the military program made by those authorities, I shall vote to support the bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I shall consume but a very few moments of the time of the Senate this afternoon in the discussion of the pending measure. I am convinced that the senatorial mind is about made up and really I think the matter has been talked about enough and ought to be disposed of. The subject has been exhausted and there is no necessity for further long-drawn-out debate on this question, and I am not going to contribute to the tedium of the hour and delay action in the Senate by anything that I may say.

Merely to keep my record straight and with a desire only to promote the interest of my country, Mr. President, I desire to say that whatever Army may be necessary to win this war I shall vote to raise it in the proper way. But I will not consent to impress 18-year-old boys into the service of this country; I will not consent that the conscript officer shall be authorized to invade the sacred precincts of the home and take the tender youth of 18 years of age from the bosom of his mother, to send him across the ocean to die in the trenches of France until it shall be demonstrated beyond doubt that there is not sufficient man power above 21 years of age available to win the war. I think it has been clearly shown in this debate that there are ample men, men fit for military service, men who can leave their homes and their respective vocations without detriment to the industrial and social interests of the Nation to win this war who are above 21 years of age. I do not think it is necessary to go into the nursery to secure soldiers to fight this war. As the able and learned Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] has well said on yesterday, "This is a man's war and ought to be fought by men." To take the boy just 18, in the formative period of life, and compel him to render service whether he has the spirit or the physical strength is not conducive to the better interests of America. Voluntary service on the part of the youths of the country is an inspiration, but compulsion kills the spirit of enterprise and stifles the patriotic impulse. I do not believe the American people will approve the conscription of the youth of the land to fight this war, and it is my conviction that the enactment of this feature of the bill will be a source of profound disappointment to the men and women of this Republic. And I am still of the opinion, Mr. President, that the wishes of the people even in this matter should be considered.

The 18-year-old boy is not consulted about the law; he is not permitted to participate in the election of Senators and Representatives; he is not allowed to settle with the Senator or Representative whose vote compels him to submit to the infinite sacrifice which he is called upon in this crucial moment to make; and such treatment, I submit, is not fair, especially when we consider the fact that there is ample man power above the age of 21 to win this war. It is unjust; it is un-American; it is contrary to every idea of liberty which is vouchsafed to every citizen by the Constitution of the United States.

I think the whole plan of conscripting the boy under 21 years of age is contrary to the letter and spirit of the Constitution and the genius of our institutions as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States. The law books are full of cases that sustain this view, and it will be prudent for Senators to consult them before this radical and unusual step shall be taken.

It is my judgment that the principle is irrevocably fixed that the full burdens of citizenship, including compulsory military service, do not accrue until the American youth has reached the age of 21 years. But, Mr. President, I am not going to take the time of the Senate to argue that proposition at length. It is too well established to call for elaboration. There is not a lawyer in this body, there is not a student of American history that is not familiar with it. I desire to say, however—and I can not make it too emphatic—that every idea of justice and fair dealing condemns the suggestion to take the boy from his home and force him to perform compulsory military service in a foreign land before he is given the right to cast a vote for or against the Congressman who makes the laws. To my mind, such a law is the acme of injustice.

It seems to me that the American Congress has forgotten the source of its authority. The feelings and wishes of the people are ignored. It is my deliberate judgment that if the people of the United States were permitted to vote on the proposition as to whether or not boys 18 years of age should be conscripted that 85 per cent of the vote would be against it.

It is so manifestly improper that for its utter condemnation I need only to reproduce the inspired words of one of America's greatest advocates, who on a somewhat similar occasion said:

"I need not grope among the ruins of antiquity, stumble over the fallen columns of obsolete statutes, or delve in the pages of black letter lore in order to establish a principle written by the finger of God upon the heart of every man." And he might have added "upon the heart of every mother." And I would rather trust that mother heart to guide me aright than the logical processes of the cold-blooded, selfish politician.

I am going to vote against conscripting boys under 21 years of age, but if my views shall not be adopted by the Senate I shall vote to pass the bill, preferring, however, that the maximum age limit should be 60 rather than 45. If it shall be discovered that there is not enough man power between 21 and 45 or 60, we will then do the thing needful to raise the requisite number. The war must be won, but it should be won by men and not boys of 18 years of age taken from the parental home without their consent.

I wish to say in conclusion, Mr. President, that I shall be very glad to vote for an amendment to this bill authorizing the 18-year-old boy to volunteer, even against the wishes of his parents, if Congress has the power to give to him that exemption.

With this simple statement of my views I am now ready to vote on the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I ask permission to have read into the RECORD a letter I received this morning, in view of the statements which have been made with reference to young men in the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to reading the letter requested by the Senator from Oregon? There being none, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

AUGUST 23, 1918.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am glad that you recalled the plans of Washington and of Gen. Knox for an Army service including men from 18 to 45 years of age.

You may also remember that in the constitutions of many of the States there has been and yet is a militia schedule that includes men of those ages.

You may also remember that some of the most distinguished soldiers of our own and other countries, in both Army and Navy, entered the service at ages earlier than 18, and many at 19 and 20.

Lafayette came to America at 19 and was made a major general in our Army at 20.

Washington himself was a lieutenant colonel at 22.

"Lighthorse Harry" Lee entered the Army with Washington at 20.

Gen. Alexander Macomb, who became Commander in Chief of the Army (1835–1841) entered the Army at 17.

Commodore Stephen Decatur—"My country, right or wrong," Decatur—entered the Navy at 19.

James Lawrence—"Never give up the ship"—entered the service at 16.

Commodore Barney also entered at 16.

Commodore Matthew F. Maury and Admiral A. T. Mahan both went into the service at 19.

Gens. Wilkinson, Armstrong, William J. Worth, and Stephen W. Kearney entered at 18.

Gen. M. C. Meigs, of Georgia, who superintended the Capitol extensions and was Quartermaster General of the Army, entered the Army while yet a youth.

Gen. Robert Anderson, of Fort Sumter fame, graduated from West Point at 20 and became an officer immediately.

Gen. John Mosby Bacon, of Kentucky, entered the Army at 18 and served in both the Civil and Spanish-American Wars.

Gen. Frank D. Baldwin—with whom I served in Cuba—entered the service at 19, was given the congressional medal of honor at 20, and again a like medal for Indian service.

Lieut. Gen. John C. Bates, lately Chief of Staff, entered the service at 19 during the Civil War.

Rear Admiral Benham entered the Navy when he was 15.

Rear Admiral Charles Stuart Boggs, who fought past Forts Jackson and St. Philip in the Mississippi during the Civil War, also entered the Navy at 15.

Gen. Braxton Bragg—"A little more grape, Capt. Bragg"—of the United States Army, and famous Confederate commander, after whom an Artillery training camp has just been named by the Secretary of War, graduated at West Point when 20 and became a second lieutenant of the Third Artillery.

Gen. Simon Bolivar Buckner graduated at 17 and at once became an officer of the Army.

George W. Cable, famous novelist, entered the Confederate Army at 19 and served to the end of it.

Lieut. Gen. Adna R. Chaffee, late Chief of Staff, entered the United States Army as a private at 19.

Gen. Samuel Cooper, who was Adjutant General of both the United States Army and the Confederate Army, graduated at West Point and entered the Army as a lieutenant at 17.

Rear Admiral Dupont, whose statue is in Dupont Circle of the National Capital, was a midshipman at 12 years of age.

Rear Admiral English entered at 16.

John Ericsson, inventor of the Monitor, entered the Swedish Army at 17.

Admiral Farragut became a naval officer at 19.

Ex-Senator J. B. Foraker became a soldier in the Civil War at 16.

Capt. Gridley, of Manila fame under Dewey, entered the Navy at 15.

Gen. William Henry Harrison, President of the United States, served at 18 on Gen. Wayne's staff.

Gen. Franz Lieber was a soldier at 15, and was the author of "the Code of War for the Government of Armies of the United States in the Field."

Capt. Richmond Pearson Hobson, of Merrimac heroism in Santiago Bay, entered the Navy at 19.

Gen. Henry W. Lawton, who died in action in the Philippines, entered the Army as a private in 1861 at the age of 18.

Gen. W. W. Loring became a soldier at 17, serving in the United States Army, the Confederate Army, and the Egyptian Army.

Gen. Arthur McArthur entered the Army as first lieutenant at 17.

The list could be amazingly extended, but the instances cited should assure the timid that there is no great hardship or any terrible "robbing of the cradle" in enlisting soldiers, at least for training, at the age of 18.

I served myself for three months in the Confederate Army and surrendered to the Union forces before I was 14 years of age.

With all high consideration,

Truly, yours, SAM W. SMALL.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon permit a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is needless to say that none of the men referred to in that letter were conscripts.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, that seems to be a sort of man of straw that the Senator from Mississippi sets up every time we talk about getting young men into the Army. Gen. Grant said—and I believe his testimony is worthy of consideration—that the men who fought for the South during the Civil War were proud of the fact that they were conscript soldiers. The fact is the South adopted conscription before the North. There is not a gallant man of the South to-day who served as a conscript whose patriotism or valor anyone would challenge because of the fact that he was a mere conscript soldier.

Mr. President, I have had that letter put into the RECORD simply because it shows the possibility of young men making reputations for themselves in the Army. The names given are only a few of those who entered the service before they were 21 years of age and who attained fame in the service of their country. The list might be multiplied to over two million and a half young men who went into the Army under 21 years of age. The figures have been read into the RECORD a number of times, and I am not going to insert them again.

Mr. President, the young men are the men to fight this war if it is intended to fight it to a successful finish, and America intends to fight it to a successful finish, as Gen. March so positively stated in his testimony not long ago, and as the American people firmly believe will be done.

Mr. President, not to go out of the Senate itself, I want to call the attention of the Senators to our esteemed colleagues, some of whom are with us now, some of whom have passed over, and some of whom are not now in the Senate. I call attention to the fact that the Senator from Virginia, Mr. MARTIN, was in the Confederate Army when he was 18. The Senator from Minnesota, Mr. NELSON, was in the Union Army when he was 18, and his record shows that he was captured before he was 20. The late Senator from Virginia, Mr. Daniel, was in the army at 18, and was an officer before he was 19, and obtained a prominent position as an officer of the Confederate forces. Mr. Kenna, of West Virginia, a former Senator here, was in the army at 16. Our very distinguished and beloved colleague from Alabama, Mr. BANKHEAD, went into the service at 18 and served throughout the war. The Senator from Wyoming, Mr. WARREN, whom we all know and love, went into the service at 17, and he is with us yet.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] went into the Army at 18 and is now a Member of this body.

As Rev. Dr. Small says in his letter, the names might be multiplied a thousandfold of men who have distinguished themselves and who have gone into the Army, whether by conscription or by volunteering matters not. But I call the attention of the Senate to one or two names that he did not mention that just happened to come to me while I was reading his letter.

Alexander Hamilton was born January 11, 1757, and entered the Continental Army in 1776 at the age of 19, and was a captain of Artillery. He was appointed aid-de-camp to Gen. Washington March 1, 1777, just as he had passed his twenty-first birthday. He served with Washington nearly through the war in a most gallant fashion, and left a record to be proud of.

Aaron Burr, who distinguished himself in more than one severely fought battle, was born in 1756, and entered the Continental Army in 1775. And so you might go down the list and find men who served before they were 21 years of age, and who had commissions in the service of their country.

I think it is a reflection on the young men of the country to talk about not taking them into the service. I am besieged all the time by young fellows of 18 years and upward who are anxious to have the bill passed, and are anxious to know what is going on in the Senate with reference to it; and there are those who are still younger than that who are anxious to be permitted to go in.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I had hoped that we might get a vote on this bill to-day. I shall be obliged to be absent on Monday and Tuesday, and I was very anxious to vote on this bill, and to vote for it.

Like a good many other of my colleagues, if I had had my choice I should have preferred to have the age not as low as 18, on account of the educational advantages that so materially aid a young man at that time in the prosecution of his future life's work; but I recognize the fact that we need now, as rapidly as we may get them, an army of sufficient size to bring this conflict to an immediate end, if possible. I believe that the interests of the country, the interests of the boys even of 18, will be better served in the long run by having them join with their older colleagues in the Army and put an end to this conflict, so that the normal condition of things may be resumed as soon as possible, and the Government may be turned back into the hands of the people unmenaced and unjeopardized by this sinister host that has withstood the forces of civilization for the four years the war has been in progress.

I think, Mr. President, that perhaps it is wise to widen the difference between the ages, because of the industrial conditions that exist in the country. If it were limited to just 21 to 31 the Army that we might raise perhaps would not be sufficient to equip those in the field and to take care of the industries at home, because at every age there are some men peculiarly equipped for certain work, and there are others of the same age who are not so equipped, who can be spared for the war. So that if we have the region from 18 to 45 from which to choose, we will do the least violence to the commercial and industrial life of the country, while having a wider area from which to select men for service in the field.

I shall vote for the bill for the ages from 18 to 45, as I said, with reluctance on account of denying the young men of the lesser ages, 18 to 21, the educational privileges that are so much greater now than they were in former years. An education to-day means more than it ever meant before. It is a real, practical equipment for life work. It is not like the condition a few years ago, comparatively, when education was a literary affair. Our great grandfathers knew nothing of the practical application of the forces of nature in the great affairs of men. A liberal education may be obtained by a real working knowledge of a steam engine or of a telephone, properly constructed, so that in getting his life work a man gets a trained brain; for there is no schoolmaster equal in his exactness to science. You have to get the conditions perfect before you ever get the answer. It trains the mind to think truly and think clearly, and also gives the student his life work while he is obtaining his education. That has never occurred before in the history of the world; and the young man who misses it to-day, who has not what we term a technical education, must fall in the class of the hewers of wood and the drawers of water. He must be subservient to the man who does know more than ever before in the history of the world; and it is with reluctance that I would deny any boy, any citizen of the United States, the matchless privilege, the necessary privilege of securing the proper equipment for his life work during those years of accretion, those years between 18 and 21 when the imaginations of childhood are beginning to give place to the real facts of life.

But there is a greater problem before us than that of solving the problem of one's individual life work. It is solving the problem of America's life work. It calls for all men; it calls for the women; it calls for the children; it calls to every citizen of the United States now, regardless of every advantage or disadvantage, to join in the conflict to do away with that horrible revelation of savagery under the guise of civilized form known as the Prussian autocracy—one that has paraded itself in civilized garb while its heart was as black as the hell that gave it birth. I think it is time for us to unite to raise an army sufficient to crush it out, and allow us once again to resume the blessings of our American civilization and government.

I shall see that my vote is properly protected by a pair. I want to state that were I here I would vote for the bill; but, not being able to be here I wanted to go on record as to how I stood in reference to it, and I will use my best endeavors to have my vote protected by virtue of a pair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the amendment of the committee, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the House bill on this subject is likely to pass some time this evening, and the Military Affairs Committee will meet Monday morning, and be ready to report out the House bill as soon as the Senate convenes on Monday. In view of the fact that to pass this bill now in any shape and send it over to the House with the House bill on its way over here would create an unfortunate legislative condition, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, August 26, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 24, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God and our Father, who holdest in the hollow of Thy hand the destiny of men and of nations, so move upon their hearts and assert Thy wisdom, power, and goodness that they may bring order out of chaos, truth out of error, love out of hate, peace out of war, righteousness out of sin, joy out of sorrow; that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in earth as in heaven, through Him who taught us the way and the truth and the life. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGES IN THE DRAFT LAW.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 12731.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill amending the draft law.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Speaker, while that is pending I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from The Adjutant General regarding the ages at which men can enlist under the law. Yesterday the question was raised, and the statement was made that men of 16 or 17 could be enlisted. I stated the contrary, and I would like to insert this letter in the RECORD.

Mr. LANGLEY. Let the letter be read, Mr. Speaker. We would like to hear it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the proper place for that is in the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole. I do not think we ought to do it in this way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects. The question is on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Those in favor say "aye"——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, on that I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 337, not voting 93, as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12731) amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose the committee had under consideration what is known as the Madden amendment. Debate had been exhausted on that amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Did I understand the Chair to state that all debate had been exhausted on the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, debate had been exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There were one or two gentlemen asking for recognition, and I personally wanted recognition for a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I apprehend that it was the intention of the gentleman from Illinois in offering the amendment that employees of the executive departments of the Government should not, by reason of that employment, be exempt from military service. If that is the intention of the author of the amendment I beg to submit to him that it is the law now. The man who is in the executive departments of the Government to-day by reason of that position is not exempt from the operation of the draft. If this becomes a law, as we expect it will, there is nothing in this amendment to the selective-draft act that will exempt such individual from its operation. Now, if that is the purpose of the amendment, I suggest that the amendment is unnecessary.

As the practice now is, the heads of the departments are required to certify and ask for an exemption for those in that department or bureau whose services are necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of the bureau. I think it is the common sense of mankind, certainly of the membership of the House, not to interfere with the orderly discharge of the many responsible duties of the executive departments of the Government. I think we ought not to adopt any amendment calculated to interfere with the discharge of their important duties.

If it is the intention of those in favor of this amendment to do more than that, or if the amendment without that intention will do more than that, then I submit to you that it is positively harmful. It seems to me entirely unnecessary that we should write into the law an amendment with this particular phraseology. If it is desired to express the congressional intent that men who are in the executive departments shall not be relieved from military duty unless their services are indispensable to the proper discharge of the work of that bureau, then let us say that in so many words. That might have some moral effect in the operation of the administration of the law.

I am willing to admit, I am even willing to affirm with emphasis, that in my humble opinion there are many employed in the Government departments here in Washington to-day that are not indispensable to the proper discharge of the functions of the various bureaus. I will go further, if you please. I believe one of the causes of inefficiency, or perhaps I had better say lack of maximum efficiency, in the several bureaus to-day is the surfeit and surplus of employees. I have said before, and I now repeat, that in one bureau of this Government in Washington, the name of which I forbear to mention, there are more employees than there are in the entire military establishment of Great Britain.

They are standing in the way of each other, and they are, by their numbers, impeding the proper discharge of the duties of that particular department.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But we do not correct that by this amendment. It may be that we should affirmatively say that we should write in the law that no head of a department should ask for the exemption of an employee therein unless the services of that employee are absolutely indispensable to the proper discharge of the work of such bureau. If so, let us write it in that language, but this does not do that. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. My information is that a good many employees who have been exempted upon the ground that they are indispensable to the work of the departments are people who have been in the service only two or three months. Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not; but I can readily understand how this privilege can be abused, and I also can readily understand, how a man with technical knowledge and experience may have been brought here but recently, who is of draft age, whose technical knowledge and experience make him indispensable to the proper discharge of the work of the office. I do know that in some of the bureaus they have carefully combed out and recombed out all of the men they thought they could dispense with. They have been very sensitive about it, and very properly so. I submit it would be inadvisable to adopt this amendment in its present form. Either it makes no change in existing law—and I do not think it does—or it prevents technical, skilled men from being utilized in branches of the Government service, men who are positively indispensable to the proper performance of the work of that service. It would be the height of folly to take from the Government service at this time such men as are indispensable to the efficiency of that service, men whose places can not be filled by others, and send them out into the field where their special qualifications are of no value. Again, I say, let judgment rule, and defeat this amendment.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. It seems to me that it would be most unfortunate to adopt this amendment to this bill. I am inclined to think that the amendment would produce the very inequality which my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] seeks to avoid. He stated in his remarks last evening that the purpose of this amendment was to put these persons in civil employment in the Government on an equality and on the same basis as employees of other institutions. Under the provisions of the bill as it now stands they are on the very same basis as the employees of other institutions. They may be exempted when in Government service only when their occupation or when the duties which they perform are necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment. That is true all over this country. Any man anywhere whose employment is necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment may be exempted from military duty. That is just where the civil Government employees stand, and if the gentleman's amendment is adopted it produces an inequality that does not give those Government employees, even though their duties are essential to the maintenance of the Military Establishment, the right or privilege of exemption. It has been stated on the floor here that some of the departments have exempted a great number of employees on account of favoritism. I do not know whether that is true or not. I presume my opportunity to know is just about the same as that of every other Member of this House, and personally I do not know of a single instance where a Government employee has been exempted on account of favoritism. Assume that that has been done, assume that the privilege has been abused, I assure you that it does not justify us in abolishing this privilege of exemption to certain Government employees. It is said that 2,130 men in the Agricultural Department have been exempted. I do not know. I do know this. I know there is a vast number of men in the employ of the Agricultural Department whose work is essential, whose work is highly technical, whose places can not be readily filled by going out and calling on the labor of the country for men to take these places, and I submit to you that there is no department of this Government, the maintenance of which and the effectiveness of which is more essential to the maintenance of the Military Establishment of the Government than the Agricultural Department.

I, for my part, shall assume that if there were 2,130 men exempted from military duty in that department they were exempted in good faith, because I believe that the heads of the departments are better able to judge of the necessity of the services of these men in the particular line in which they are employed than I am, and I believe that they are better ablé to judge than you are. I submit we ought to approach this kind of legislation in a somewhat different spirit from that in which it has been approached, not upon the theory that the heads of the departments are not administering the law properly and that they are showing favoritism. I want to repeat that, in my opinion and my belief, their purpose and intentions are just the same as ours. If we should deny exemptions to these technically trained men in the Agricultural Department, we might, I fear, break down the work of that department. If we should take away all the professional men from the Department of Justice or from the Health Department we would destroy those departments. If we allowed no exemption to the experts in the Treasury Department we would create utter confusion in that department. We must allow the civil side of the Government to keep its experts, to keep the men whose service is essential, or we will render the Government inefficient. Never was a thorough, able civil government more necessary than now. We must look to it to raise an Army and provide for its maintenance and support. It never had a greater task, and we must not permit the experts in these departments to be taken away at this critical time. Government employees are liable now, and will be under this bill, to military duty the same as all other employees. We all know that the heads of departments have acted on that idea. In every department we see great service flags decorating the walls, showing a star for every man who has left for war duty. Thousands have gone out of civil service into the military service, and under this bill thousands more will go. It is only the technical men, the experts, the men essential to the proper maintenance of the Military Establishment that may be exempted under this provision of the bill. The proposed amendment will deprive the Government of their services. I am willing to trust to the heads of departments to exercise wisdom and fairness in the administration of the provision. If they fail it is not our fault. It is our duty to make wise laws, and we can only trust to the executive to administer them wisely. We can not correct the abuse of privileges granted in good laws by passing bad laws. We should vote this amendment down.

Mr. COX rose.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get some agreement in respect to closing this debate. It seems to me that the matter has been sufficiently debated and that we should close it at the end of five minutes. I make a request that we do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close at the end of five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I should like to have five minutes.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have five minutes.

Mr. DENT. Then I will modify it by making it 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want to earnestly support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. If any Member of the House has taken the opportunity of reading the answers to the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Illinois made by the various heads of departments, I am at a loss to understand how he can oppose the amendment. I am not accusing the heads of departments as being unfair, but those reports speak for themselves. I have read not only the names of the men who have been exempted but I studied them. Tell me that a little stenographer is indispensable to the running of any of these departments? Tell me that a little clerk drawing a salary of $1,200 to $1,500 a year is indispensable to the running of that department, yet if you will read the 10 or 12 reports made by the various executive departments of this Government you will find scores of men who have been exempted from military duty, and the report itself shows the only thing they do is to fill stenographic jobs or fill the position of a small clerk doing work that the wives of the soldiers who are now fighting in France ought to have. [Applause.] Doing work, gentlemen, that the disabled soldiers of this country ought to have. [Applause.] There are more slackers in the city of Washington this very moment than there are in the great city of New York, with ten times its population. [Applause.] You can scarcely get through a department down here but what you find men between the age of 21 and 31 filling little insignificant clerical positions. Read these reports——

Mr. VARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I have not got the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. COX. And ex-Members of this House who have served here 18 or 20 years, been here long enough to know how to pull the ropes, find where their boys are exempt, some of them filling the little, insignificant position of a deputy internal revenue traveling agent, and yet exempt because their work is indispensable to the running of that department. The place for those men and the place for those clerks is squarely in the Army. As the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. MADDEN] said yesterday, my nephews are fighting on the blood-soaked battle fields of France this morning if they have not been killed. They are no better than your nephews, no better than any other man's nephew. They were farm boys. They unhitched their teams, left their harvesters, and went straight in the Army or Navy, and yet you are told here by certain men—Oh, I wonder if there could possibly be anything behind the men who are warning us here, whether or not they have anybody down in these departments who is liable to be affected if this amendment goes through. I just wonder if that is true. You are told this will disorganize the whole business. Why, you remember this spring when Marshal Haig was fighting with his back to the wall, you all remember that famous message that Lloyd-George sent to comb the civil service of England, and the civil service of England was combed, and no doubt it was honeycombed, with a lot of infernal slackers like you find here in the city of Washington. From the time they combed the civil service in England and sent these men to the firing line the Germans have never made another foot of advance. Of all the righteous amendments offered here, it is this amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when this amendment of my colleague was first presented, naturally, like all the rest of you, most of you, no doubt, I was heartily in favor of it until I got to thinking about the possible effects of the amendment, and now I have become thoroughly convinced, gentlemen, that it is absolutely impracticable and unwise and ought not to be adopted by this House. [Applause.] It is just as essential, gentlemen, that the arsenals and the shipyards of these United States be conducted as it is that the Army be filled up. This amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] if enacted into law will have the effect of repealing, at least by implication, any clause of the selective-service act by which these men who are now employed in the navy yards and arsenals of the United States are given deferred classifications. A mere inspection of the original selective-service act will convince you, gentlemen, this is true. The only provision there is in the original act I know of is found on page 4 of the printed act, which gives the President the right—

> To exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes: County and municipal officials; custom-house clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mails; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States; and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate.

Now, the Madden amendment is:

> And no person employed in any of the executive departments of the Government, Government establishments, boards, or commissions now or hereafter shall be exempt or given deferred classification by reason of such employment from military duty under the provisions of this act.

Does not that repeal the provisions of the original selective-service act giving the President the right to put these men in a deferred classification by special order? If it does not, I am in fault both in my logic and my legal reasoning. I have just returned from an inspection trip to a great arsenal in my district. I found there 700 men working at special bits of work in the arsenal who are given deferred classification on request of the commandant of that institution.

Mr. VARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have not much time, but I yield.

Mr. VARE. Would not this seriously interfere with the work of the Emergency Fleet Corporation in the building of ships?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Absolutely.

Mr. VARE. Will it not interfere with the manufacture of munitions in the arsenals?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Why, certainly; let me tell the gentleman——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will yield if it will not take too much of my time.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman makes a statement that he ought not to be permitted to make without interruption.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That may be the gentleman's idea about it, but not mine.

Mr. MADDEN. All manufacturing plants manufacturing ammunition have men exempted, have they not?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Well——

Mr. MADDEN. And this does not take any exemption rights away from any man who is working in a war plant, whether an arsenal or anywhere else. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I say to you that this amendment, if it is enacted into law, will repeal the provision of the original act that permits these men in the arsenals and navy yards of this country to be exempted by special and deferred classes. There are men in these arsenals to-day who are doing such work as boring out the castings for guns and making carriages for 75-millimeter guns who are doing work the nicety of which requires it to be within one ten-thousandth of an inch in order to be correct. They are men who can not be replaced in these institutions. In the arsenal at Rock Island there are several hundred men in deferred classification, and if these men are drafted into the military service of the United States and put into the Army it will cripple and greatly embarrass the production of munitions in that Government arsenal. These men are making carriages for the 75-millimeter guns, a work which the French Government thought we could not do in this country, a work that requires the utmost nicety and exactness by the workmen employed to do it. Do you want to go into these Government establishments all over this country and, by adopting a foolish and radical amendment to this bill, put these men in the service when they are doing work absolutely indispensable to the winning of this war? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the House has succeeded in getting itself in a position of some absurdity. Last night, without debate and amid a wild hurrah, we passed an amendment removing the exemption which applies to Members of Congress, while this morning, with great seriousness and with due dignity, we debate the question of whether or not like treatment shall be accorded the clerks of departments. The deductions from the situation are somewhat shocking to one's self-respect, to say the least.

I trust that I will not be speaking more harshly than circumstances justify when I say that the amendment of my good friend from Texas [Mr. GREGG], placing, as it does, the legislative branch of the Government in absolute control of the Military Establishment is about the most unwise provision that I have ever seen adopted in this Chamber. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. With pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman believe that that amendment will be rejected when it gets into the House?

Mr. REAVIS. I think we both may trust the wisdom of the House to defeat it when it is presented by a separate vote.

But it is not to the Gregg amendment that I desire to speak. The Madden amendment at first appealed to me very strongly. At first blush it seemed so fair and just that I was inclined to support it heartily. I took the reports of the heads of the various departments home with me last night and studied them carefully. I found many instances where men of draft age who had been in the departments but one month had been exempted. The inference is, of course, that such men were put in the departments for the purpose of evading military duty and that such purpose was accomplished by the Cabinet member's asking for an exemption. But the number of such men is comparatively very small. I would be glad indeed to reach them and to put them where they belong. But if to get them we have to take thousands of men out of positions in which they are performing services of inestimable value, I fear the evil we will do will far outbalance the good.

One of the great and pressing needs of America is chemists. The situation with reference to gas attacks abroad is very serious. It was my privilege recently to spend a little time with Gen. Pershing. While the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] and I were talking with him a member of his staff reported from the front that German prisoners said that they had walked through American gas nine times without gas masks and without injury.

We visited the American gas section a few miles from Chaumont and the commanding officer stated that they needed chemists and were almost hopelessly undermanned.

The Germans have perfected mustard gas, the most frightful of gases, which dissolves the lung tissue and from which I have seen American soldiers die in the last six weeks, so that they produce it as a by-product, with little effort and small expense.

It is only within the past three months that the allied powers have discovered how to produce it, and then only at almost prohibitive expense. We have hundreds of chemists of draft age working in the Bureau of Standards and the Bureau of Mines on this proposition and with hopes of immediate success. Shall we by the Madden amendment take them away from this indispensable work and put them in the trenches as private soldiers?

It is the duty of Congress to see that every American citizen of draft age is put in the avenue where his contribution to the Nation's welfare will be greatest. [Applause.]

To do this we have to trust somebody. We can not presume that the members of the Cabinet are untrustworthy and dishonest. We can not believe that these men are going to use their high offices to violate law and to provide bullet-proof jobs for favorites. Even though we may believe that imposition has been practiced in a few isolated cases, we can not for this reason legislate so as to take from the Nation the benefit of scientific service of which it stands in such great need.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Gladly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have been informed that there are some 3,000 chemists now engaged directly or indirectly on Government work and that 70 per cent of them are within the present draft age. Their places will be impossible to fill.

Mr. REAVIS. Unquestionably. Let me relate an incident within my own knowledge. A young man who graduated from the University of Nebraska with high honors as a chemist was a very valuable employee of the chemistry department of the Department of Agriculture in Washington. He was drafted and refused to ask exemption or to ask his departmental head to exempt him. He is to-day a private soldier, with his country in sore need of his services as a scientific man. He ought to be over here in the gas division assisting in finding one of the greatest needs of the allied armies to-day.

Mr. NORTON. I agree with the last statement of the gentleman that that man should be in the chemical department, but is there any reason why he should not be in the military service of the Government and at the same time be in the chemical department of the Government? I understand now that they are taking drafted men and placing them in the chemical department, and that that is the policy of the Government, and there is no reason why they should not all be in the military service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. I regret that time prevents an answer to the question.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may so modify the pending amendment as to strike out the words "Government establishments," and I should like to ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes on the reasons why I ask this privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner which will be reported by the Clerk.

Mr. MADDEN. And I think that will cover all the objections.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MADDEN moves to modify his amendment by striking out the words "Government establishments."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—to the gentleman having five minutes in which to discuss his amendment, I will ask that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS], a member of the committee, be allowed two minutes in reply.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, can we have the amendment read as modified?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment, by unanimous consent, will be read after the Chair puts the request of the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Alabama, that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for five minutes and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL. When the Clerk reads the amendment, may we not also have read the McKenzie amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The McKenzie amendment was voted on yesterday. The Clerk, without objection, will report the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 12, after the word "emergency," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add "and no person employed in any of the executive departments of the Government, boards, or commissions, now or hereafter, shall be exempt, or given deferred classification by reason of such employment from military duty under the provisions of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think there can be no question but that the amendment as now written can not be objectionable to anybody. If there was any doubt in any man's mind as to whether men employed in the arsenals or the shipyards would be prevented from engaging in such employment because of the amendment I have proposed, the language now stricken out takes away that doubt. The time has come when this Congress——

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. VARE. What about the Emergency Fleet Corporation and the Shipping Board?

Mr. MADDEN. That is the same thing.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman's amendment now retains the language, "Government boards." The Shipping Board is one.

Mr. MADDEN. I am trying to explain why we ought to pass this amendment. We have reached the stage in the progress of war legislation when we must say to the American people that we are opposed to any favoritism, no matter by whom practiced. [Applause.]

We must assure the American people that the Congress of the United States at least is in favor of giving every man an equal opportunity. We must say to the widow that her son shall have equal rights with the son of the millionaire. We must say to the farmer that his boy shall not be charged with greater responsibilities on account of war than the son of the governor of a State. We have men now on the pay rolls of the Government who have been placed there under recommendations of the governors of the various States, men who have been placed there by members of the Cabinet, and who have been exempted from military service because of the influence behind them.

The National Association of Agriculture, the National Grange, through their secretaries, called me up this morning and said that this one amendment is the thing that they shall insist upon to the extent of their ability.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. They propose not to have the farmer class discriminated against.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MADDEN. We propose—I propose—that a man engaged in a manufacturing institution shall not be compelled to fight while men engaged in Government departments are exempt from responsibility under the act.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I have not time to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I can assure you gentlemen here that there are thousands of these men who have been exempted, walking over each other in various offices throughout the United States. In the city of New York alone, in the quartermaster stores, there are 210, all within the draft age, or nearly all, managing departments. This work before the war was done by civilians and by women, and it can be done by civilians now and by women, and men who are defective physically, but mentally fit, can be called into requisition to do the technical work for which these men have been exempted.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that hundreds of men who are now doing this chemical work, scientific men in the service, are detailed to do that work, now that they are once in the service.

Mr. MADDEN. Why, I have men in my own family, technical men, scientists, who have not claimed exemption. They are in the battle line. Why should they be in the battle line and these other men allowed to sit in an easy chair, wearing spurs, so that they may be able to keep their feet on the desks? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want first to reply to the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX], who addressed the House a few moments ago, and who impugned the motives of the Members who have spoken in opposition to this amendment by attributing to them selfish motives by charging or intimating that they had sons in deferred positions in the executive departments.

I spoke against the amendment yesterday afternoon, and I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that I was not prompted to do so by selfish motives. I have not a relative that I know of in the Government service. The reports of the various heads of the departments show that there is only one man there from my district. I do not know him personally, neither do I know his people. I have two sons who have reached their majority and they have long since enlisted in the military service of their country. [Applause.] I have two nephews, and only two, who have reached their majority, and they also have long since enlisted in the military service of their country. I have a third nephew who is 18 years old, and three months ago he enlisted in the service of his country, and I resent the statement of the gentleman from Indiana.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there has been enough said on this amendment, but I want to add this: The War Department says that it will absolutely demoralize and create chaos in the department. There may have been abuses, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has said, but there are abuses in other branches of the Government, which can not be helped. There will be abuses as long as these departments are handled by men. We must look at it from a broader viewpoint. We must not demoralize the service because some man has abused the authority given him. I hope that the amendment may be defeated. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. All time has expired in the debate on the amendment. The question is on the adoption of the Madden amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 115, noes 142.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. DENT and Mr. MADDEN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 128, noes 140.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to come in after the Gregg amendment. I understand that to be the last amendment that was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: After the last word in the Gregg amendment strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following proviso: "Provided, That when any person shall have been placed in a deferred or exempted class for any of the reasons in this paragraph set forth he shall not be entitled to remain therein unless he shall in good faith continue, while physically able so to do, to work at and follow such occupation, employment, or business, or some other productive occupation, employment, or business deemed necessary hereunder; and if he fails so to do he shall again become subject to the draft. The President shall make regulations for enforcing this provision.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have proposed to the section of the bill now under consideration reads as follows:

Provided, That when any person shall have been placed in a deferred or exempted class for any of the reasons in this paragraph set forth he shall not be entitled to remain therein unless he shall in good faith continue, while physically able so to do, to work at and follow such occupation, employment, or business, or some other productive occupation, employment, or business deemed necessary hereunder; and if he fails so to do he shall again become subject to the draft. The President shall make regulations for enforcing this provision.

Before discussing the amendment in detail I want to submit some general observations on the situation which obtains at this time. The world war, in which we are now one of the most powerful and aggressive belligerents, is the most stupenduous clash of arms and struggle of peoples that the world has ever seen.

More and more we are beginning to realize its magnitude and comprehend its sacrifices and adapt ourselves to the changed conditions which it necessarily imposes, but there are some things which we have yet to fully understand.

One of these is that the ordinary rights and prerogatives of business and labor can not be maintained in their fullness and completeness in time of war. That some sacrifices of these things must be made for the benefit of the public good. It is a broad statement, yet a true one, that America's first great victory will be won when the personal advantage and the personal privilege of each of us have been submerged in unselfish devotion to the common cause.

America has the right to expect every man to do his duty. When I was a boy and attended the public school in the little town where I was born, I remember that our patriotic teacher adorned the walls of our schoolroom with mottoes gathered from the sayings of famous men. One of these mottoes contained the language of Lord Nelson, which he emblazoned upon his colors in the Battle of Trafalgar, "England this day expects each man to do his duty."

The great naval commander knew that if in that battle each man did his duty the victory would be complete, and if each fought for fame or his own selfish advantage the battle would be lost.

Conditions are not different now. If the man power of America loses sight of its own selfish advantage and concentrates its talent and energies on the one supreme task of bringing this fearful conflict to a successful and righteous conclusion, then there can be no doubt as to the ultimate outcome, and victory is certain to be ours in the end.

But if we, who remain at home, concern ourselves more with the desire to take advantage of every opportunity to improve our own situation and entrench ourselves in the enjoyment of what we fancy to be our own particular rights and privileges, then danger is surely ahead and the sooner we realize it the better it will be.

I can not believe, however, that any considerable number of our people, even if they are so inclined, will be allowed to pursue a course of that kind. Public opinion is demanding that every man shall do his duty, and public opinion is a court of power whose decrees will in the end be respected and enforced. Military discipline will not permit the soldier to be a slacker on the battle field, and public opinion is not going to permit the individual who remains at home to be a slacker either in business, public office, laborer in industry, farmer on the farm, or in any other vocation or employment. The Nation must have the benefit of the very best efforts of all of us and nothing short of that will fill the measure of demand. This is a war of peoples and not merely a war of armies who are contending for supremacy on the battle field.

The United States Government is sending great armies to the front to fight shoulder to shoulder with our allies, the French, the English, the Italians, and the Belgians.

Our Navy is patrolling the high seas day and night to strike down and defeat the treacherous submarine. Our merchant ships are carrying great loads of supplies for the use of our armies at the front and for the military and civilian population of our allies. All this is a great work and is such as should evoke our strong admiration, but in order for these efforts to continue and to expand to even greater efficiency, those who remain at home must put every ounce of loyalty, everything that we have in the crucible and rally as one man to the support of the Government.

It is your Government, it is my Government, it is the people's Government, and while none of us claim for it perfection, for no human institution is perfect, still it is the best Government in the world, and we must lose sight of every other consideration save and except its preservation and maintenance in this supreme hour of its peril. Do not let us make the mistake of minimizing the seriousness of the situation that confronts us.

The German military autocracy realize that it is now or never with them, and therefore they have determined to stake all in the great battles on the western front during this year. If they fail then, a sure and certain defeat awaits them in the end, and some day their embattled millions must retire to the other side of the Rhine and give up every foot of Belgium and every foot of northern France, and make reparation for their wanton destruction and devastation; and they know that, and that is why they are fighting so desperately in the present hour.

If they win—well, they must not win; they will not win; they can not win. I will not believe that they can win against brave men fighting under orders like those issued by Sir Douglas Haig some time ago to his men in France and Flanders, in which he said:

Every position must be held to the last man. There must be no retirement. With our backs to the wall and believing in the justice of our cause, each one of us must fight to the end. The safety of our homes and the freedom of mankind depend alike upon the conduct of each one of us at this critical moment.

I will not believe that they can win against brave men like the Belgians, who threw their handful of an army across the path of the invading Hun and suffered all but annihilation rather than submit to the conquering heel of a tyrant, and inspired their brave king to say:

A nation which fights to defend itself wins the respect of everyone, and will not perish.

I will not believe that they can win against brave men like the gallant French, who made their stand at the first Battle of the Marne and determined to die rather than to give back another foot, and whose heroism was well expressed in the words of a great Frenchman:

France prefers to die rather than to live in a degraded humanity, and humanity would be degraded if the savage beast who forms what to-day is called Germany could be victorious and rule the world. To fight Germany, France has already lost 1,000,000 men. We are ready to give more, and when there are no more men the women will rise up. When there are no more women the children will rise up, and when there are no more children the dead will rise up. France will live free or die free, and France will live.

I will not believe that they can win against brave men like those American crusaders under Gen. Pershing, who in the darkest hour of the allied cause crossed the ocean and in a land 3,000 miles away from their own firesides bravely stemmed the tide of onrushing Teutonic savagery and threw them back in confusion and defeat at the second battle of the Marne. No; the Germans will not win against men of that kind. The spirit of the allies is unconquerable and can not be intimidated or crushed. But in the hour of this tremendous struggle and sacrifice what are we going to do who are left at home? Are we going to stand behind them? Are we going to do our part? Are we willing to deny ourselves and to sacrifice?

Capital and labor must defer their quarrels for another day, if, indeed, it is ever necessary to again renew them with some of the bitterness that has existed in the past.

Mutual concessions must be made and criminations and recriminations must be abandoned in face of the common danger which threatens us. For, if Germany should win this war, none of the rights of capital would be secure, and the rights which labor now enjoys—the best and most liberal of any nation in the world—would be thrown in the scrap heap and industrial slavery dictated by Teuton policy would follow.

I have nowhere seen the true situation more graphically and eloquently put than in a speech by England's great premier, David Lloyd-George, made to 3,000 union officials at Glasgow, Scotland, on Christmas day, 1915. In that speech he said, "Either we must tell the soldiers that we are sorry we can not get the guns and shells to enable them to win in 1916, owing to the trade-union regulations, or we must tell them that if they manage to hold out for another year, perhaps American workmen will help us to get enough for 1917. Another alternative is that we might tell the Kaiser frankly that we can not go on.

"I can not return to Parliament and report through the House of Commons to the British Army that skilled workmen won't suspend their rules to save their fellow countrymen's lives on the battle field. Some of you seem to think that this war is a passing shower. It is the deluge! It is a convulsion of nature. It is a cyclone which is tearing up by its roots modern society and wrecking some of the flimsy structures of civilization.

"It is an earthquake, upheaving the very rocks of European life. It is one of those seismic disturbances in which nations leap forward or fall back generations in a single bound. All this chattering about relaxing a rule and suspending a custom is out of place. You can not haggle with an earthquake."

No, gentlemen of the House, neither can we afford to haggle with an earthquake. A supreme moment of history has come and upon the outcome depends, in a large measure, the future civilization of the world. The responsibility on every individual is plain, and the man who does not do his duty now and who lags back and sloths and sees how little work he can do for a day's pay or how small a value he can give the Government for what it purchases from him or his corporation is a mighty sorry citizen, whether he is a millionaire or a day laborer; whether he is a member of a labor union or never saw inside of one; whether he is in the factory, in the mine, on the farm, or a captain of industry in the marts of trade. There is no difference of obligation, and the measure of duty is only limited by the ability and capacity to perform it.

The full comprehension of this obligation will mean much to the success of our cause, and the failure to grasp it will be one of the serious mistakes of the war.

DISCUSSION OF AMENDMENT IN DETAIL.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I will pass from these general observations to a more detailed discussion of the amendment which I have offered.

An amendment similar to this one has been reported favorably by the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate and has been referred to as the Reed-Thomas amendment, but the amendments are not identical and there is this difference between them. The amendment that has been reported favorably by the committee of the Senate reads as follows:

Provided, That when any person shall have been placed in a deferred or exempted class for any of the reasons in this paragraph set forth he shall not be entitled to remain therein unless he shall in good faith continue, while physically able so to do, to work at and follow such occupation, employment, or business.

My amendment is the same as the above, except I have made this modification: After the word "business" insert—or some other productive occupation, employment, or business deemed necessary hereunder.

The difference between the two is very considerable. It has been contended that the Senate amendment in its original form would be capable of being used as an instrument to conscript labor, but no intelligent Member of Congress can contend for a moment that my amendment as modified will work any conscription of labor. I have no desire or purpose to do that. My amendment will leave the individual entire freedom of choice as to his employment and as to who his employer will be, provided that he works at an occupation, employment, or business necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of the national interest during the emergency. The Senate amendment says that whenever the registrant who has been deferred on industrial grounds shall cease to work at such employment, business, or occupation he shall lose his deferred classification. The words "such occupation, employment, or business" might be construed to mean that if he was an employee of the United States Steel Corporation, for instance, at the time he was granted the deferred classification and was engaged in war work and should cease his employment with such concern that he would lose his deferred classification notwithstanding he was ready and willing to engage in some other essential war work.

In other words, if a registrant was deferred as a shipyard worker, then a shipyard worker he would have to remain; if he was deferred as a coal miner, a coal miner he would have to remain. If he was deferred as a farmer, then a farmer he must remain or forfeit his deferred classification.

I do not think the country is prepared to go that far, unless the need for it should be very apparent and urgent, and so if the Senate amendment is really susceptible of that construction, as has been plausibly argued, it should be modified, and therefore I have added the words "or some other productive occupation, employment, or business deemed necessary hereunder," and with this addition no such possible construction can be placed upon the amendment as that to which I have just referred.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. Before I ask it I want to say that I am very heartily in favor of the principle that the gentleman is trying to write into the law; but if we do not put it in, is it the gentleman's opinion that the work or fight rule would not be operative?

Mr. BLACK. I will answer that question by stating that it is my understanding that the Secretary of War construes the present law as applying to individuals who are exempted, and who then cease to work, but he does not apply it to cessations in the aggregate. In other words, not to large bodies of men who go on an uncalled-for strike, and I think it is time that the United States Congress was writing into an affirmative law that when thousands of our bravest and best young men are at the front fighting for our liberties and for the protection of our homes and firesides, that no man ought to be permitted to stay at home in a deferred classification and not work at the occupation or business or employment for which he was deferred as long as he is physically able to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS again rose.

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman will permit me, I have only a few minutes more, and I would like to give the reasons why I favor the adoption of this amendment. I am very much interested in seeing that the spirit of this deferred-classification law is not repeatedly violated by unnecessary strikes in essential war industries and at a time when the Government of the United States has furnished ample agencies for the settlement of all these labor disputes along lines of justice and fair play.

Why are these deferred classifications granted? Are they granted as a matter of personal right to the registrant? Are they granted because of any partiality or favoritism to the registrant? No. If they were granted on any such grounds as that, then the whole fabric of the selective-draft law would fall to the ground. They are granted because of a consideration for the interest of the whole country and the common welfare. The man who is exempted or granted deferred classification because of industrial or agricultural reasons and is placed in class 3 is not placed there because of any individual right or privilege of his own, but he is placed there because it is deemed that the needs of the country require it; and, therefore, when he is thus classified and afterwards ceases in good faith, while his health permits him to do so, to work at that essential industry or some other one that is essential, he ought to forfeit his deferred classification. I can not for the life of me see what right he would have to further claim it.

Now, I have heard it contended that this amendment would be a reflection or a blow aimed at organized labor. I deny that. I repudiate that assertion or that reflection. I deny that there is even the remotest purpose to make any fight against organized labor. There are 15,000,000 or 20,000,000 people in this country who labor with their hands at industries and employments that are more or less useful, and out of these 15,000,000 or 20,000,000 people less than 3,000,000 belong to organized labor. And are we to say that all the men who have been placed in these deferred classifications are members of organized labor, and that therefore it is a reflection or a slap at them? For some of the union labor leaders to contend that an amendment of this kind is directed against organized labor is about as sensible as the action of the three famous tailors of Tooley Street, who met and adopted resolutions beginning, "We, the people of England." The amendment would simply affect every man who failed to carry out in good faith the purpose of his deferred classification, and that wholly without reference to whether he was a member of any labor union or not.

I make no charge against the loyalty and patriotism of union labor. I freely concede that the great majority of them are loyal and patriotic, just as the great majority of all our citizens are loyal and patriotic; but because that is so is no reason that whatever small minority of them that there may be who do fail and refuse to discharge their duty and obligation to the country should not be made to do so.

The majority of the business men of the country are loyal and patriotic, and yet because that is true is no reason why, if one is caught profiteering and swindling the Government, he should not be punished for his acts. An argument of that kind, it seems to me, is absurd on its face. It is no more a reflection on organized labor to pass a law of this kind than an embezzlement statute would be a reflection on honest men. I will tell you what this amendment does and who it is directed against. It is directed against the slacker who is unwilling to work, whether he is a member of organized labor, or on the farm, or in a railroad shop, or in the mercantile establishment, or wherever he may be. That is who the amendment is meant for, and it certainly would have no application whatever to the man who does his duty and has a proper sense of obligation to the Nation in this hour of its greatest need.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. Does not the gentleman know that the boards have the right to reclassify registrants?

Mr. BLACK. I answered a similar question propounded by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] a few moments ago, and pointed out that the Secretary of War has placed much too narrow an interpretation on the present law, according to my opinion.

Mr. FIELDS. I did not hear it.

Mr. BLACK. It is contended by some of the sponsors and spokesmen for the American Federation of Labor that an amendment of this kind would affect the ordinary right of labor to strike. They say that one of organized labor's most effective weapons is the right to call a strike whenever it pleases, and therefore it ought not to be interfered with. I will admit that the strike has been an effective weapon in the hands of organized labor. Sometimes it has been used wisely, sometimes very unwisely.

But we are not talking about peace conditions now. Far from it. These are extraordinary times. To use an expression of President Wilson upon one occasion, "The world is on fire."

It is no ordinary matter to draft 5,000,000 men into the military service of the United States and send them 3,000 miles across the sea to fight on foreign soil to protect American rights, which include the rights of labor as well as every other group of citizens, and it is getting high time that every citizen realize that this is a time of universal obligation to service and is no time to hinder and impede the United States Government in its efforts to mobilize the strength of the Nation.

There are many things which we prize very highly in times of peace which we must subordinate to some extent in time of war. For instance, in times of peace the wheat farmer is allowed an open and free market for his product and is permitted to get whatever price it will bring, but under the pressure of war necessity he must now sell it at the price fixed by the Government.

The American household in time of peace is allowed to make its bread out of whatever kind of flour its purse will buy and the family taste prefers, but now, under the pressure of war necessity, the Government prescribes what percentage of wheat flour shall be used and what percentage shall be substitutes.

The experience of being allowed only 2 pounds of sugar to each person per month is a new one to the American people, and yet these restrictions are being everywhere cheerfully obeyed, because they are deemed for the public good and have been made necessary by war conditions. The great railroad systems of the country in time of peace have been permitted to manage their own affairs, except, of course, subject to certain reasonable restrictions imposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the different State railroad commissions, but now they have been taken over by the Federal Government for the period of the war and they are no longer managed and directed by their owners but by the Director General of Railroads for the United States Government.

And only very recently the telegraph and telephone companies have been similarly dealt with and their direction and control for the period of the war committed to the hands of the Postmaster General. These things have been done upon the theory and principle that the public interest and national welfare is paramount and that the rights of the corporation and individual must be subordinated to the interest of the public good. And in this time of national peril is any group of citizens going to be continually clamoring for the right to strike and actually exercise it from day to day, to the great detriment and harm of our war preparations? And are they to continue to do this in the face of the fact that we have now in full operation a War Labor Policies Board to fix the policy of the Government toward labor and a National War Labor Board to put these policies into actual execution?

I referred a while ago to a speech which Premier Lloyd-George made to 3,000 union officials at Glasgow on Christmas Day, 1915. I want now to call your attention to another vigorous speech which he made along these same lines to the workers at Liverpool in 1915. Among other things, he said in that speech:

> This is not a Government entering into negotiations with you. You have got an interest in this concern. It is yours as much as ours, and I want you to help us. Should Germany win, God help labor! It will come out of it worst of all.
> I am not saying a word about trade-union regulations during a period of peace; I have no doubt they were essential safeguards to protect labor against interference with its rights and prospects. But many Government and business regulations have to be suspended during the war because they are inapplicable in the emergency, and the same thing applies to many union rules and practices.
> And there must be no deliberate slowing down of work. I know of a skilled workman in an arsenal who worked very hard and was earning a great deal of money; he was doing his duty by the State. And he was warned that if he repeated the offense he would be driven out. Now, in war such things are intolerable. I urge that whatever rules, practices, or customs there are which interfere in the slightest degree with the increase of war material shall be suspended during the period of the war. We ask only for a suspension; the Government pledges that those safeguards established by the unions prior to the war will be restored when it is over.

This was in 1915. Since then the labor situation in Great Britain has grown a great deal better; in fact, there has been but very little subsequent trouble, due to the strong, virile, vigorous policy of Lloyd-George, wisely based upon fair and just treatment to labor and a firm and unyielding demand that labor reciprocate by holding the national welfare paramount to any of its preconceived notions as to its rights, and customs in times of peace.

SOME INFORMATION ABOUT STRIKES THAT HAVE OCCURRED.

Am I wrong in my belief that there have been many needless and uncalled-for strikes in the United States since the war began? I think not, and I do not believe that any impartial observer who has studied the situation can come to any other conclusion but that our war preparations have been greatly hindered and delayed by these unnecessary labor troubles. Have they been frequent? Well, I should say they have.

The Scientific American, one of the oldest and most highly regarded journals in the scientific, mechanical, and industrial field in the United States, said in an editorial on the shipping situation, in its issue of February 16, 1918, that during a period of six months there have occurred over 3,500 strikes in the shipbuilding industry and in those industries which are contributory thereto.

And despite the fact that in many cases the wages in these shipyards have been doubled and trebled, I see in the papers of to-day, August 24, that skilled workers in the shipbuilding industry of the country have presented "friendly demands" to the labor adjustment board of the Shipping Board for increase in wages to $1 an hour, double time for all over time, Saturday half holidays throughout the year, and 10 per cent bonus for all night shopwork. Their present wage is approximately 75 cents an hour. If these demands are granted it is safe to assume that they will satisfy for only a short time and that before very long other demands of a similar nature will be made and pressed just as hard for allowance.

This unending process can not continue to go on indefinitely without serious harm to our effective prosecution of the war. In some of these shipyards about as soon as one wage scale is agreed upon another is demanded. The brakes must be put on some time and it is getting about time it was done.

Research Report No. 3 of the National Industrial Conference Board makes an analysis of 1,156 strikes which occurred in the United States between April 6 to October 6, 1917, and this investigation shows that in the strikes in these 1,156 establishments that the number of employees made idle was 283,402, and the number of days of production lost was 6,285,519.

The magnitude of the production lost in these strikes would at any time be serious. In war time, when every day of production of essential materials has definite influence on the war situation, it is litle short of appalling.

To visualize better the magnitude of the waste, it may be pointed out that it would require the labor of 251,400 persons for a whole month to make up for the reported loss of production, or that a manufacturing plant employing 1,000 workers would have to operate about 21 years of 300 workdays each in order to offset the time thus lost.

Soon after the sinking of the transport ship Tuscania last February I received a letter from a widowed mother who lives in one of the counties of my congressional district whose son was on the ill-fated ship. She inclosed with her letter a letter from her son, which was written from the port of embarkation in New Jersey, just before he boarded the ship to leave for France. And in that letter the young man said to his mother, among other things, this fine expression: "Mother, I do not know whether I will ever come back; but if I do not, remember this: That I died for my country." Well, the brave young man will never come back.

Soon after I received the letter from the anxious mother, I inquired of Gen. McCain at The Adjutant General's office of the War Department, and he gave me the information that the young man went down with the Tuscania.

I conveyed the information to the mother, and returned the letter from her son, which I knew she would prize above all earthly possessions, and wrote such words of sympathy and consolation as my own inadequate language could express.

In the breast of that boy dwelt the spirit that everywhere pervades our fighting forces in France and does honor to the American soldier, and will surely in the end bring victory to our cause.

And men like him, who are giving their lives as the price of liberty, deserve to be supported by every ounce of loyalty, every ounce of energy, every ounce of strength that our civilian population can summon to the service of the Nation.

But we all remember the unpleasant fact that at the very time that the country was mourning the lives of these young men who were lost on the Tuscania that the ship carpenters were striking in the Atlantic shipbuilding yards and tying up the building of ships which were so badly needed to transport our soldiers overseas and to supply them after they reached there.

The strike continued until President Wilson was forced to take a hand and send a stinging telegram of rebuke to William L. Hutcheson, of Indianapolis, president of the Brotherhood of Carpenters. And during the pendency of this strike Chairman Hurley, of the Shipping Board, sent the following telegram to this same president of the Brotherhood of Carpenters, which I think was particularly well timed and accurately expressed the sentiment of the American people as to the situation. The telegram read:

While the people of this country are mourning the loss of brave young Americans in the Tuscania horror—while thousands of American homes are anxiously watching the lists of survivors slowly coming in to make certain that another precious life has been snatched from the Atantic Ocean—a telegram comes, and with it the grim announcement that the carpenters in shipyards are now on strike.

Before any Government agency is given an opportunity to act and despite the good record of our adjustment board's promptness and fairness in dealing with all labor matters, you attempt to paralyze the shipbuilding industry at the port of New York.

Do you realize that you are adding to the fearful danger our soldiers already face, the danger of starvation and the danger of starvation if food and ammunition are not sent over in ships and in many ships at once? Do you think the fathers and mothers whose sons are making this sacrifice will sit patiently by and permit this paralyzing of the life line between us and the western front to go on?

Will you take my friendly suggestion and go back to work at once? The machinery for dealing with all your demands and with the right of labor is at hand. You will be well advised to follow the methods of well-managed and patriotic labor organizations, at least until you have tested whether or not your Government, for which as shipbuilders you are now working, can be fair.

I advise you to end the paralyzing of the shipyard work now. I am sure you would not deliberately imperil the lives and safety of brave fellow citizens. I am sure you believe with me that those whose sons are now giving their blood that you and I and our children may be safe and free will not long permit either you or me to invite destruction of heroic lives and disaster to a great world cause.

It would be interesting to know what our soldiers at the front think about these strikes in essential war industries when the country is in such urgent need of its maximum production and when they themselves are undergoing such tremendous sacrifices and hardships on the battle field.

I imagine that their feeling in the matter is pretty well expressed in a letter which Senator UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, received from a young officer in France some time ago, and a clause in which letter read:

The other morning just at daybreak I came into a front trench and I saw one of our boys lying there, the rain pouring down on him, lying in the mud, the slime, the dirt, and the blood, with his rifle pointed at the German trenches watching for German snipers. He had probably laid there for three or four hours without moving for his country's cause. I can not understand when all these men are making this sacrifice how our people at home can consent to labor strikes in the shipyards when we need ships so vitally to win the war.

A letter like that needs no comment. It speaks for itself and in tones that should be heard by every Member of this House, and should arouse us to a full sense of our duty and responsibility and a determination to see to it that no man is permitted to remain in a deferred classification because of his occupation, employment, or business unless he shall in good faith while physically able so to do work at and follow such occupation, employment, or business, and when he fails to do it make him immediately subject to the draft.

That is all my amendment does. It does not in any way provide for any conscription of labor. It simply says to the registrant that you must not take advantage of your deferred classification to loaf, and if you do choose to make loafing your occupation you will not be permitted to follow it very long.

It is a just amendment—just to the registrant and just to the country at large—and ought to be adopted.

GOVERNMENT MACHINERY FOR SETTLING LABOR DISPUTES.

In this connection let me say that I would not favor an amendment of the kind which I have proposed if the slightest doubt existed as to whether or not the Government had set up adequate machinery to fully protect the rights of labor in all of these essential war industries.

But there is no doubt whatever on that subject. The War Labor Policies Board and the National War Labor Board are fully equipped and have ample authority to secure to labor all of its rights in any of these matters.

As an illustration of the work that it is doing let me quote from the Official Bulletin of August 20, 1918, dealing with a recent strike of 3,000 men in eight plants at Waynesboro, Pa. A decision on the matters at controversy was rendered by the National War Labor Board, and, among other things, the Bulletin says:

At Waynesboro, Pa., 3,000 men in eight plants struck for a minimum wage of 30 cents per hour. The lowest-paid men had been getting 22 cents. The board established a minimum of 40 cents, 10 cents more than the workers asked. The board is giving further consideration to this minimum and reserves the right to revise it on the basis of what is necessary to maintain the worker and his family in reasonable comfort.

And in the same way many other illustrations could be given of the fairness, yes, even generosity, of the National War Labor Board, to labor, and which forcibly impress us with the fact that there is an utter lack of any need for these strikes to go on and that some policy should be adopted by the Government to put a stop to it and force an obedience to the decisions of the National War Labor Board.

We who have voted to draft 5,000,000 men into the military service of the Nation, who have voted to place over 200,000 miles of railways under Federal control, who have voted autocratic powers, never dreamed of in times of peace, to the food administrator, who have voted to take over the vast systems of telegraph and telephone lines for the period of the war, who have voted billions of dollars out of the public Treasury and are preparing to vote billions more, ought not to hesitate to vote for an amendment which simply provides that a registrant shall "work or fight." Only that and nothing more.

CONCLUSION.

To some Members it may seem that a policy of procrastination and delay in this important matter is wise, but I do not think so.

Gen. Peyton C. March, our Chief of Staff, recently stated to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House that "eighty divisions of Americans should be able to bring the war to a successful conclusion in 1919."

Four million men at the front in France by June 30, 1919, and 1,000,000 men at home in training.

This policy, while unquestionably the best, is a policy of swift, sweating concentration and will demand our utmost strength and energy.

Can we do it? We can. Congress has passed the law that will give the man power, and it is now up to the civilian population who do not go into the Army to keep up production to the maximum limit behind the lines and see to it that the greatest army that the Nation has ever put into the field is fully supported with all war necessities.

But it will be no small task, be assured of that. We are facing the greatest undertaking the Nation has ever had. The farmer must bring into play all of his skill and experience and means of production in order that the harvests be maintained to their maximum capacity and our armies and civilian population be fed. The shipbuilder must work with more abounding energy than ever before, because 3,000 miles is a long way to transport a great army, and it takes ships, and then more ships, to do it; the railroad worker on train and in shop must devote himself with more fervid determination than ever before to his task, because these arteries of commerce have become the means for the transportation of the very lifeblood of the Nation.

Everywhere, all along the line in these industries and employments, there is essential, indispensable work to perform and a vital need to "carry on." Everybody together, one in heart and purpose, all of a single mind, and America wins!

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] seeks to carry out, in effect, an amendment offered in another branch of the Government and known as the Thomas amendment, and other amendments of that kind. These same amendments in different language were presented to the Military Affairs Committee. The Thomas amendment was discussed; the whole question was gone into as to whether there should be any amendment dealing with this particular matter. The committee decided, after having hearings, at which Mr. Frank Morrison, of the American Federation of Labor, the Secretary of War, and Gen. Crowder testified, that no such amendment was appropriate to this bill and therefore should not be included in this legislation.

Let me quote from the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs in reference to the Thomas amendment:

Chairman DENT. But that amendment was no part of the original program?

Secretary BAKER. It was not a part of the original program of the War Department.

The CHAIRMAN. And was included by the Senate Military Committee?

Secretary BAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LUNN. What would be the situation with the Thomas amendment in case there was some serious disagreement and a strike was called?

Secretary BAKER. I think it would be left to the President to determine whether the strike was in good faith, and if it was the President undoubtedly would not use this power to undertake to control the relation of employee and employer.

Mr. LUNN. In other words, you are opposed to trying to use the President's regulation to control that situation?

Secretary BAKER. If in good faith.

Mr. TILSON. Take an indispensable man, for instance; a toolmaker is exempted because he is a toolmaker; he decides that he will not make tools any more. Have you not the power under the law already provided to draft him?

Secretary BAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILSON. Then, what will the Thomas amendment add—what force does it add to the present law?

Secretary BAKER. I had not thought of that.

Gen. CROWDER. It is a declaration of a policy already being enforced, unless it looks toward the conscription of labor, and that is the interpretation a great many people have placed on it.

Mr. LUNN. Inasmuch as the regulations already in force deal with that, why is it necessary?

Gen. CROWDER. It is not, as the Secretary has defined the use he would make of it.

Mr. LUNN. Why insert something that is not necessary and that is subject to a great deal of misconstruction?

The CHAIRMAN. I think the Secretary has made it clear that this is no part of the military program.

There is no question whatever but that the War Department now has in force regulations to deal with every industrial slacker. They can immediately call them into the service. No Member of this House is more in favor of meting out drastic treatment to a slacker than am I. The present regulations can deal effectively with these cases.

Mr. OVERMYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. OVERMYER. Is there any obligation under the present regulations requiring the employer to report to the proper board when an employee changes his occupation?

Mr. LUNN. I can not answer the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. Is not the Shipping Board required to report when a man ceases work? My recollection is positive that it is being applied by the Shipping Board, and I understand it is of general application.

Mr. LUNN. Undoubtedly the gentleman is right, but I personally have no knowledge of this particular point. But, to proceed, this is no time, while we are dealing with the man-power bill, to inject a controversy over an unnecessary amendment. Already there is suspicion abroad that the legislative branch first suggesting this amendment has some subtle purpose in view; that it is aimed primarily to take away the right of the workers to strike no matter how just their cause. The question was put to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], in substance, as follows: "Will this amendment deal with strikes?" His answer, in substance, was: "It will include strikes." At the present time we have practically no strikes of any size in America. In the past there has been trouble, but the Government established regulatory departments that are doing magnificent work. The National War Labor Board, headed by ex-President Taft and Mr. Frank Walsh, has solved and is solving industrial disputes. Mr. Frank Morrison testified that organized workers will resent such legislation. Not that they will favor slackers but will resent that which would, by implication, place all men who are in industries in deferred classification in the position of being potential slackers, so much so that punitive law was necessary. There is no body of our citizenship, I do not care who they are, who are any more loyal and self-sacrificing and patriotic than the mass of our workers now producing war materials, munitions, ships, and other things essential to the prosecution of the war.

Thousands upon thousands of our young men are in deferred classification, not at their own request but because the Government through the various industries have determined that their best service could be rendered in the production of war materials. Many of them would prefer the active service on the front. The passage of this amendment would carry the distinct impression that these loyal men are in deferred classification by special privilege and that unless they continue in that special privilege they will be punished by being put on the firing line. In order adequately to punish real slackers, for which we now have regulations, this House can ill afford to cause the stigma of slacker and the suspicion of disloyalty to rest on the millions of patriotic men who are in deferred classification due to the determination of the Government that their greatest contribution to the war is in serving the Nation where they now are.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman noticed in this morning's Post the fact that one organization is demanding $1 an hour for its services?

Mr. LUNN. I did not notice it, although I noticed that there was a strike of conductors and conductorettes in London, England. Did the gentleman notice that?

Mr. JAMES. And if the steel people were to go before the President and say that it was necessary to have an increased price for steel, and it was granted, and then instead of raising the wages of the men they cut them down, and the men struck, would they not then be compelled to go to war, according to the Black amendment?

Mr. LUNN. They would. Their draft boards would be compelled immediately to cancel their deferred classification, no matter how just the cause of their dispute.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. I will.

Mr. BLACK. Is it not a fact that we now have a National War Labor Board to adjust such differences as those mentioned by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES]?

Mr. JAMES. And if a man stayed out of work for five days he would be taken out of his deferred classification?

Mr. LUNN. Will the gentleman bear in mind that in our committee there was presented a case in respect to one branch of the Steel Corporation, where the workers were willing to submit their grievance to the National War Labor Board, but the members of that particular part of the Steel Corporation would not submit to the Government? This concern could lock out all of these employees and we would lose valuable and efficient men for industry.

Mr. BLACK. Do we not now have on the statute books a law that permits the Government of the United States to take over such an industry as that.

Mr. LUNN. And the gentleman's solution of the problem would be for the Government to take it over immediately when there is trouble?

Mr. BLACK. Unless the matter could be settled by the National Labor Board.

Mr. LUNN. Would the gentleman have the Government take it over if the employers lock out the men?

Mr. BLACK. I would have both employees and employers obey the law of the Government and sustain essential production.

Mr. LUNN. Why not include in the gentleman's amendment employers as slackers who close their shops and lock out the men?

Mr. BLACK. If they are granted deferred classification upon that ground, the amendment would serve to include them, and they should be classed as slackers. The employer and the employee should be made to work or fight. That is my position.

Mr. LUNN. Here is the upshot of this entire matter: An amendment is before us declared wholly unnecessary by the Military Affairs Committee. The Secretary of War has stated that it was no part of the bill as framed by the War Department. Gen. Crowder has stated that it is not necessary. Then, why inject this controversial amendment in the man-power bill? There is a certain class of men who are antagonistic to the workers in general, who seem to cherish a prejudice against all workers, and they have consistently endeavored to secure conscription of labor. In the other branch of the legislature are men who seem determined to put into this bill some form of a camouflage labor conscription. It should not be done. This amendment and any other similar amendment ought not to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment ought to be voted down regardless of what the motives of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], who offered it, may be. It is a disturbing question at this time, just as the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] has said. Mr. Morrison, of the American Federation of Labor, appeared before the committee and stated his opposition to it, with his reasons. The Secretary of War has not asked for it. He has said that it is not necessary. Gen. Crowder has said that it is not necessary. Why does the gentleman from Texas want to bring in amendments that are practically in opposition to the Secretary of War and the Provost Marshal General? We should give them something that will help them out, not give them something that they do not want and will prove a disturbing factor.

Mr. BLACK. Did not the Secretary of War say in the hearings that he could see no objection to an amendment of this kind?

Mr. SIMS. I do not remember; I was quoting what the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] has said; I did not attend the hearings only for a few minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. He did say it.

Mr. BLACK. I will say that he did say it.

Mr. SIMS. I am not a member of the Committee on Military Affairs; but here is a bill that has hardships enough in it without inserting a provision that will be regarded all over this country as something intended for intimidation purposes. This war can not be won by money or fighting men alone. It has got to be won by products and they must be produced by labor. Let us take the case of a contractor who has a contract to supply war material. If it is known to him that his laborers can not quit because they do not get the wages or treatment that they think they ought to have, then he will not give them what they demand, because they will come within the provisions of the Senate amendment or the Black amendment, should it prevail. We have enough of the spirit of intimidation. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] knows that we are always presumed to intend the natural result of what we are doing. One of the natural results of our act, if we pass this amendment, will be a disturbance, disharmony, uncertainty, experimentation, contentions, and controversy, and the Lord knows we have explosive situations enough now without unnecessarily injecting into this bill something that ought not to go into it. It was not in the bill as it was sent over from the Secretary of War. Let us not put in every imaginable thing that might suggest itself on the spur of the moment. I hope the amendment will be voted down, just as I hope the Gregg amendment will be voted down, when we get into the House where we can vote upon it.

Mr. CANNON rose.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto shall close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. I think I may want 10 minutes, though I think I shall get through in 5.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the men in the Army and the Navy in the military service of the United States are not discriminated against when you draft them, whether they want to go or not. If their feelings are hurt there, they might be hurt. It is true some of them are unorganized and some are in organized labor. Organized labor, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] well said, does not exceed 3,000,000 men. I doubt if it numbers that amount. Now, I just want to put in a protest here and now against the self-constituted defenders of labor. [Applause.] My God, I have followed in the early part of my life until pretty well up toward the middle every path that labor treads. I have been supported by labor, organized and unorganized, in my long service in this House against the objections of gentlemen whom I might designate who have discussed, and gentlemen like unto them, this question of labor during this session of Congress. I will not grow personal. Now, gentlemen, the gentleman has well said perhaps that already the power exists, and, as I understand, it will exist when this draft bill passes from 18 to 45—already the President has in what is known as the Chamberlain law the authority to call into the military service of the United States men engaged in labor, and that includes organized labor. So there it stands. He can do it to-morrow. I voted for the law. No objection was made to it in the House or Senate. I think it is barely possible that the gentleman from New York, who is so eloquent and plausible, possibly may have been asleep at the switch. I do not know whether he was or not. I would like to know whether he indorses that law now.

Mr. LUNN. I am sure that I was not asleep at the switch, because I never sleep at the switch.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman indorse the law now that enables the President to draft into the military service of the United States any man or men engaged in an industry or agriculture and take them from the dollar an hour, or whatever compensation they may receive, and put them on the $30 a month, or put them into the shipyards and put them upon the railroads or anywhere else that is as necessary? Does the gentleman indorse that kind of power?

Mr. LUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. LUNN. I would certainly in time of war favor that power if applied equitably and absolutely and universally over the entire Nation, whether to men or property.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, over the entire Nation. If the men in the shipyards strike in that great employment to transport our soldiers and food across the sea or to operate the railroads is it necessary to conscript everybody else that are not striking and are not refusing? Oh, the gentleman is not consistent. [Applause.] I was going to say he was "demagoging," but I will not speak disrespectfully. In my judgment, the gentleman camouflages. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. LUNN. I have consistently taken the stand that our legislation should apply equally and equitably, so far as possible, on our entire population. If we are compelled to conscript men, then go to it and conscript all men, employees and employers alike. What the gentleman wants is to leave free the dollar, but put in bondage the man.

Mr. CANNON. Good God, the President can seize any industrial establishment, and has already been seizing them by the wholesale. If any proprietor in an industry anywhere in the United States should act unpatriotically, the President can take it over in the twinkle of an eye. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. But he does not put the owners in uniform, the older men, as you evidently want the workers treated.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; I say, you catch them at the age of 45. We are about to amend the law and the law already on the statute books will apply to them. Let us be honest with each other. I am a better friend of labor, in my judgment, than is the gentleman from New York. I stand for the equality of opportunity everywhere. [Applause.]

Now, I just wanted to say that much. I think that already the President of the United States has the power to take any man in union labor or any man on the farm or in industry and draft him into the military service at $30 a month. It is up to the administration. I am not going now to criticize the administration. I am merely speaking of what the law is. Therefore, I do not know that I shall grieve if this amendment is not agreed to, because, as I understand the law already, the power rests in the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy as the occasion arises to conscript any laborer in industry, any laborer on the farm, and that includes the whole shooting match, industry and farm. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to make a statement. The Chair has not been furnished under this unanimous-consent agreement with the name of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SMALL. I think the gentleman from New York is one of those included in that agreement.

Mr. FIELDS. I will state in the absence of the chairman, it is my understanding the gentleman from New York was included.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stands corrected. The gentleman's name is on the list.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, there is always a great deal of wisdom in the things that the former Speaker of the House, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, has to say. There is not the slightest doubt that if the bill passes in the form in which it has been presented the military arm of the country will be able to reach every male person between the ages of 18 and 45. All this argument about an amendment being necessary to prevent strikes or to obtain conscription of labor is a mere waste of time. Under the law as it is before us the Commander in Chief may call upon all male persons between the ages of 18 and 45 and draft them into the service.

It is merely a matter of regulation. And those who support the bill and who claim that they are special friends of organized labor because they oppose this amendment do not quite understand the situation. It is as clear as day that the President has that power. Until now it was the young man between the ages of 21 and 31. With the adoption of the bill it is every male person between the ages of 18 and 45 that becomes subject to the call of the President. He need not put them in uniform. He can give them a badge of service. He need not even do that. He simply calls them into the service, and that is all there is to it. The great question overlooked through the entire discussion on this bill was whether the Congress of the United States shall take 24,000,000 people and subject them to military authority. That was the great question. And after you have overlooked that great big question and have adopted a bill which permits the conscription of labor you seek to pour sand into the eyes of the workers by raising the question whether it is necessary to adopt an amendment authorizing in specific terms the withdrawal of deferred classification for certain industrial workers. As I said before, it is all a matter of regulation.

The President has adopted the policy, the Secretary of War and the Labor Department cooperating, of dealing with the relations of capital and labor in a humane way and not in a military way; but they are not bound to do so under the law.

This country must not be put in a strait-jacket of militarism. There must be some room left for voluntary patriotism. There must be some room left for voluntary sacrifices. There must be some room left for the expression of genuine devotion. The great mistake that wise men, like the former Speaker, commit when they talk about prohibiting strikes is that they compare the industrial situation to the situation in the trenches. In the trenches the officer bares his breast in advance of the men whom he leads. He shares with them a common danger and risks his life with his comrades. That is not true in industry. In the trenches the officer does not go into the pockets of the private and pick the pockets. But the leaders and the rulers of industry pick the pockets of the men who are privates in industry. That is the difference. If we had industry conducted and governed for the Nation and by the Nation, the situation would be different. Then the Commander in Chief could say to every man, rich or poor, "You are to-day a part of the fighting force of the country; just now you are not in the trenches; you are in the factories and in the mines, but all on the same footing." If we would introduce the principle that there shall be no profits in war while the Nation bleeds and while men die, that all we produce shall go for the common good, with that condition in industry I would not object to the conscription of every man and every woman capable of rendering service. But as long as the private in industry is exploited by the generals in industry we can not apply the same principle to the economic life of the country which we apply to the trenches. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] is recognized.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I feel constrained to discuss this amendment because of the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] that there were no more patriotic men in the United States than those engaged in labor, and the remark made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] that the employers of labor were picking the pockets of labor.

Let us understand what this amendment is. The bill contains a provision that "persons engaged in occupations or employments found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency" may be put in deferred classes. This amendment simply provides that persons having been placed in such deferred classes shall work in the occupation on account of which they were deferred, and if they do not work then they shall be selected for military service.

Mr. BLACK. It permits them to change to any other occupation of a similar nature.

Mr. SMALL. Yes. I read in the Washington Times of this afternoon, which happens to be on the desk before me, this paragraph:

FORT M'HENRY TROOPS ANGERED BY STRIKE.

BALTIMORE, August 24.

Soldiers at United States General Hospital No. 2, Fort McHenry, were enraged when 54 bricklayers employed on hospital buildings walked out because their demands for increased pay had not been granted.

The men are now being paid 75 cents an hour, and some time ago asked for an increase to $1 an hour.

The soldiers were of the opinion that these men should be immediately drafted and put to work again at $1 a day instead of a dollar an hour.

The foreman explained that they would not get the increase any sooner by striking and it might result in their losing their positions.

[Applause.]

I began six or eight months ago to clip from newspapers accounts of demands of labor and strikes and other activities upon the part of labor which seemed in my humble judgment to be unjustified and unpatriotic. The envelope in which I was keeping them became so full that I finally abandoned it. Does the gentleman from New York say that these men in Baltimore are the most patriotic of the citizenship of the country? Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], who declaims about the robbery being committed by employers of labor upon labor, organized or unorganized, say that these laborers in Baltimore are having their pockets picked?

Mr. Chairman, it is a thought way down in the consciences and memories of many Members of this House, and it can be corroborated, that since we entered this war in April, 1917, there has been a disposition upon the part of labor—a portion of labor—to take advantage of the demand which has come for labor and seek unwarranted prices and the adoption of unwarranted conditions, and that with increased pay there has come decreased efficiency.

I am not opposed to organized labor. I desire that every man who labors, and we are all laborers, shall receive a compensation adequate to sustain himself and his family. I would not if I could impair the right to strike. I believe in the right of organized labor to strike. But in this hour of emergency, when we have selected for military service over 2,000,000 American citizens, which number we propose to increase to more than 4,000,000, to whom we pay a pittance of $30 a month, when every intelligent citizen recognizes that at the same time we must speed up in production of all the things necessary for the maintenance of our soldiers and for the proper conduct of the war, I submit that it is the duty of every man engaged in labor, whether with his hands or otherwise, to deal fairly and justly with his Government. I regret to state that there have been instances of men engaged in labor who have not been patriotic. And there is not the slightest foundation for the statement of the lone Socialist in this body that employers are picking the pockets of labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] seems to take a newspaper statement covering the action of 54 men to determine his judgment on this very important question. He seems to forget that the Government of the United States in the conduct of the war has given the labor problem some serious attention. We have here in Washington a Wage Adjustment Board that takes care of the wage question and the conditions of employment of the men in the shipyards. The Navy Department takes care of the questions of conditions and wages in the navy yards, and is largely guided by the findings of the Wage Adjustment Board. Since taking over the railroads the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Director General of Railroads, has seen fit to create a board of adjustment on wages and conditions on the railroads of the country. Some time ago the Lane Commission handed down a decision which was unsatisfactory. This new wage board took the matter up for adjudication, and it has recently handed down an award, and even though the decision is not entirely satisfactory, the men are working and will continue to work without resorting to a strike.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] here referred to the fact that there was another newspaper statement regarding a demand made for payment of a dollar an hour by some workingmen. A few days ago the same newspaper made the statement that these men made that demand under threat of a strike. That is an absolutely unfounded statement. I am talking from personal knowledge, because I participated in those deliberations.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. No; I can not yield. I sat with those men and I heard them present their case. They presented a case for different rates of wages, and they are going to abide by the decision of the wage board. There will not be any strike nor has there been any threat of a strike either during the hearings or at any other time or place.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. No; I can not yield. The gentleman was not fair in making that statement. There is not going to be a strike. There would not be any strike if the employers were as fair to the Government as the employees are. There has not been an instance where the employees engaged in any industry relating to the war would have struck if the employers had been as fair to the Government as labor is. There is not an instance where men have refused to return to work at the request of the War Labor Board or the Department of Labor. I can refer you to innumerable instances where the employer has refused to deal fairly or to abide by the declaration of principles adopted in creating the War Labor Board; in the first instance, the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co.; in the next instance, the Bethlehem Steel Co. and the Western Union Telegraph Co.; and you can go down the list, and it will show that practically every corporation in this country that has big interests and is making war profits by the tens of millions, and in some instances by the hundreds of millions, has refused to consider this question as fairly as labor has done. They have in many instances locked out and discharged their workers and have refused to arbitrate their differences when governmental agencies created to deal with these questions offered their services.

The former Speaker of this House [Mr. CANNON] can tell you how fair he has been to labor in the past, but his attitude toward organized labor has always been one of hostility. In the bill that was before us some months ago to prevent sabotage in munition plants, despite the fact that no one ever asked for it, he injected by amendment the conspiracy section of the old Clayton antitrust law, which would prevent legitimate strikes in private plants on war work, no matter what the employees' grievance might be; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] submitted an amendment which took the teeth out of it, and it afterwards went out in conference. We should deal with this labor question just as we deal with the handling of our soldiers in France. Men who are qualified to handle this question are handling it, and handling it satisfactorily. Let these men alone. This House does not understand the labor problem. I do not understand the question in all its ramifications, and I do not claim to understand it. There are men peculiarly fitted to take care of this industrial question, just as other men are peculiarly fitted to take care of the Army. Let the President of the United States and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of Labor come before this Congress and ask us for this legislation, and then I will vote to conscript every man and woman in this country if they say it is necessary to win this war. That is how far I will go. But they have not asked for this. You have injected into this bill from the floor a proposition that the Committee on Military Affairs of the House would not adopt. Of course, there is going to be some industrial disturbance in this country, but who is responsible for it? If you dig deep down into the facts you will find that the commission presided over by former President Taft will give you causes of it, and I think you will find the employers more at fault than the workers.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. NOLAN. No; I have not the time. I have only 5 minutes, while the gentleman had 10 minutes. If the committee wishes to introduce this matter, it can do it in an intelligent manner. The War Department and the Department of Labor and every other agency handling the question will give you the facts, and then, with the facts, you can handle it intelligently. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I believe that every Member of this House is actuated by one single desire, and that is to write into the statutes of his country those provisions of law that will most speedily bring this war to a successful conclusion with the least possible sacrifice. That, I take it, ought to be and is the desire of us all. We have enacted a law authorizing that certain men engaged in industry and agriculture shall be placed in deferred classifications, because, as Mr. Hurley said, one man in a shipyard to-day is worth more than three men in the trenches. And because of this great need for skilled mechanics they should be kept at work. And so these men, engaged in these industries by the hundreds of thousands, have been placed in deferred classifications. As long as they are needed there and will continue to work, no one should object.

What is the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]? It only provides that so long as these men are engaged in these industries or in like employment they shall not be disturbed, but when they quit working, when they commence to loaf, their privileged status shall be removed and they shall be placed in the military service like all other men who have not been given a privileged status.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. No; I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, is there a man in this House, in this great emergency, when we realize that we must make great sacrifices, when we are drafting the boys of 18, who among us in this great emergency is not willing himself to work or to fight? It is un-American, it is disloyal for any able-bodied man in this great emergency to refuse to work or to fight; and that is all there is to the amendment. [Applause.] On this proposition every man ought to be made to answer the question, Will you work or will you fight? Then we should see to it that he follows the occupation of his choice.

I favor the Black amendment because it is bottomed upon the principle of universal liability to service. I did not know before that that principle permitted a special privilege to loaf.

Mr. Chairman, we improved upon the English system when we entered this war. England at the outbreak of the war enlisted her skilled employees. We placed our skilled employees that were necessary for winning the war in deferred classifications, but we insist that while they enjoy that privilege they must work. What is the situation in England and France to-day?

England and France are furnishing the field artillery for their own troops and also for the American troops, and will continue to do so for the next two and one-half months. I have here a copy of a publication of the Patriotic Education Society, from which I read of the industrial situation in England.

One factory on light shells employs about 94 per cent women. Taking shell, fuse, and grenade work as a whole, the average number of women employed is about 80 per cent. On the skilled operations, such as howitzer work, the averages are not so high, but there are individual cases which show just as high a percentage of women employees. In the largest English explosive factory there are 15,000 hands, and of these 11,000 are women. On trinitrotoluol manufacture the average is about 80 per cent women, and on the picric acid the average is about 40 per cent women. On filling fuses and that class of work the average is generally well over 90 per cent. In America we have exempted our men to do the work that the women are doing in England, and this amendment only compels them to do the work they said they would do when they were exempted from military service. When they refuse to work, send them into the war with your boy, and let a patriotic American woman fill the place. What English women can do American women can and will do.

Yet it is earnestly contended here that the industrial slacker shall be exempted and the boy of 18 from the farm shall be made to take his place in the trenches. I want the Members like the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], when they face this fall the mothers and fathers of those boys, to say, "Yes; I voted to put them there at once, and I voted against putting the industrial slackers of the country into the trenches." [Applause.]

Gentlemen, that is the issue presented by this amendment. There is no other issue. Let us get into this war with all our man power. Let us not recognize the slacker anywhere, whether he is a millionaire or a pauper, whether he is able to buy a king's ransom or only contribute a widow's mite. Let all the man and woman power of the Nation be applied to this great emergency. Let us all do our best, and the best in America will win this war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is recognized for two minutes and a half.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I see no reason in the world why the committee should get excited over this amendment. This proposition was considered very thoroughly by the Committee on Military Affairs. We had the Secretary of War before us to discuss it. We also had a representative of the American Federation of Labor. The Secretary of War, in response to my question, emphatically stated that the Thomas amendment as put on the bill in the Senate—which is substantially the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]—was no part of the program of the War Department and was unnecessary. Now, why should we go to the trouble of putting on legislation that the War Department has not asked for, that the Secretary of War himself says is absolutely unnecessary, and when he goes further and states that he can take care of the situation under the law as it now exists?

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman asks the question, "Why should we enact legislation that the War Department has not asked for?" Does the gentleman think that the Congress of the United States ought to enact only that legislation that the War Department asks?

Mr. DENT. No. The gentleman from Texas is fully aware of the fact that I have exercised some independence of judgment myself on matters of this kind.

Mr. BLACK. Here too.

Mr. DENT. But the point I am making is that the War Department says it is no part of its program, that it is unnecessary legislation, and that this can be taken care of under the present law. So, why load down this bill with unnecessary legislation?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The so-called present law exists in the form of departmental regulations, does it not?

Mr. DENT. But the regulations, of course, are made under the authority of the present law.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Exactly, and they continue to be law as long as they exist.

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But they can be changed by the same power that made them at any time it wants to?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And it can enforce them as a matter of its own policy, but a statute is a mandate.

Mr. DENT. And it has been the policy of my friend from Vermont, who is a very distinguished, very able, and helpful member of the Military Affairs Committee, not to tie the hands of the War Department by statute instead of regulations. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is a generality which I can not summon all the records of several years to disprove, but the fact is I have tried to use my own judgment quite as much as some other gentlemen have used theirs.

Mr. DENT. But that is the general practice which the gentleman has followed.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In each particular case I have tried to act in the way which my judgment told me was best.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the adoption of the Black amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK) there were—ayes 52, noes 91.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TREADWAY: At the end of section 3, page 3, add the following new section, to read as follows:

"The Provost Marshal General is authorized to appoint special examiners, to act under such regulations as may be approved by the Secretary of War, for the purpose of reexamining in local districts all men of deferred classifications. When the findings and recommendations of the examiners are approved by the Provost Marshal General, local boards may reclassify men so reexamined. Examinations may be repeated within such periods as the Provost Marshal General may deem necessary. The same right of appeal from the reclassification, either by the Government or by a registrant, as is provided in the act of May 18, 1917, shall apply to men reclassified under this section."

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, in the very able address made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] yesterday, I find these words:

I will agree to any legislation that can be enacted that will comb every classification, and deferred classifications especially, and put into the ranks men who really belong there.

All day yesterday and this morning the same thought has been reiterated, namely, that the deferred classifications should be combed for men not entitled to deferred classification and that they should be put into class 1 and into the fighting ranks. On inquiry of the Provost Marshal General's office I find that under the regulations in vogue a certain authority rests in the hands of the Provost Marshal General to appoint such examiners as this amendment refers to, but the authority is exercised to a very limited extent. I understand there are but 18 such examiners at work at the present time. Now, the situation is this: We have nearly 5,000 local boards in this country. Those local boards are made up each of three men active in the community work, of high standing, likely to be district judges or men holding various prominent positions. During the year or year and a half that the selective-draft act has been in effect those men have devoted practically their entire time to the work of these local boards. We are giving them more work all the time. As a result, when these local boards have classified men in deferred classifications, it is the most natural thing in the world that they will leave them there, in view of the fact that they are already overburdened with the department's work. There is no systematic effort to reclassify men who are in the deferred classifications. Consequently it seems to me that we should place in the hands of the Provost Marshal General an authority additional to that which he may have already, to employ such examiners as may be necessary to comb the deferred classifications. That is the object of the amendment which I have offered. It is entirely in the hands of the Provost Marshal General to employ such number as he may see fit—one or a thousand—and it will result in finding these men that you want to comb out of the deferred classification. If there is objection to such an amendment I can not see it; but if adopted it will most assuredly place in the hands of the Provost Marshal General the machinery with which to accomplish the very objects which we have been discussing here for two days, namely, the reclassifying of men and making sure that they are in the classes where they rightly belong. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LAZARO. A question for information.

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman said that the Provost Marshal General had 18 of these examiners in the service now.

Mr. TREADWAY. I understood by communication with him yesterday over the telephone that he was putting out into the field 18 such men.

Mr. LAZARO. If he can employ 18, why can he not employ more?

Mr. TREADWAY. It is probable that he can. I will not say that he can not employ them, but under no direct application of law. I ask the House to give him the direct authority of law so that he may so employ them.

Mr. DENISON. I am much in favor of the gentleman's amendment, but I will ask if this would not help secure a greater uniformity in the administration of the draft law?

Mr. TREADWAY. It certainly would, because it would give a method of bringing the act up to date. There are no end of instances where the reasons for the deferred classification have changed during the period of the year, and there is no machinery to bring it up to date. It is perfectly apparent that conditions under which deferred classification may have properly been secured a year ago do not now exist.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Why could not the examination be conducted by the local boards?

Mr. TREADWAY. For the reason that the local boards have devoted so much time and attention to the work under the present act that they ought not to be expected to do more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. Let me say to the gentleman that the only possible objection I could have or that any member of the committee could have to his amendment is that they are doing this thing now. I do not know that it is necessary to put it into law, but, so far as the principle is concerned, I have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 4 of said act be amended by adding at the end thereof the following proviso:

"Provided, That nothing in this section contained shall prevent the President, if he deems it advisable, from appointing as a member of a local board any person residing outside the subdivision or area in which such local board has jurisdiction, or from transferring a member of one local board to another local board outside the subdivision or area in which such person resides."

The following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all of lines 13 to 21, inclusive.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent at this time to have read at the Clerk's desk a letter which I received from the Secretary of War this morning relative to the McKenzie amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 23, 1918.

Hon. S. H. DENT,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. DENT: I have been asked by a number of Members of Congress to state definitely the attitude of the War Department on the so-called McKenzie amendment to the man-power bill, which Gen. March, Gen. Crowder, and I discussed before the committee some days ago.

The McKenzie amendment provided that men of 18 to 19 and 19 to 20 years, when registered, shall be put in a separate class to be called into the Army only after men between the ages of 20 and 45 years made available in class 1 shall have been exhausted by draft.

I believe this amendment unwise, and that it would seriously impair the ability of the War Department to get the men needed in accordance with the military program. I stated to the committee that the War Department intended, as a matter of regulation, so far as practicable, to defer the call of registered men from 18 to 19 years of age, and pointed out that any less elastic provision than this would require the War Department to be able to certify the complete exhaustion of the older classes before the men from 18 to 19 would be available. The McKenzie amendment is obviously much wider and more inelastic, and would be embarrassing to the department in securing speedily the number of men required by the program.

The object of this law is to increase the Army rapidly for early use. I hope it will be found possible by the House of Representatives to leave the bill in this particular unamended, and to rely upon the War Department by regulation to defer the younger men so far as such deferment is possible without interfering with the primary and urgent purpose of the bill, which is to raise the Army to the desired size, train it, and send it abroad by a definite time.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER, Secretary of War.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from the law librarian of the Library of Congress, stating the age limits in Germany, Great Britain, France, and Canada. [Cries of "Read it!"]

Mr. DENT. I will ask, Mr. Chairman, that the Clerk read it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
Washington, August 22, 1918.

Hon. S. H. DENT, Jr.,
Chairman House Military Affairs Committee,
451 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In further response to the request from your office on the 20th instant for material relating to the draft ages in other countries, I am inclosing herewith three memoranda which have been prepared in the Legislative Reference Division relating to drafting of young men in Great Britain, France, and Germany, respectively.

Very truly, yours,

J. DAVID THOMPSON, Law Librarian.

DRAFTING OF YOUNG MEN IN GREAT BRITAIN DURING THE EUROPEAN WAR.

Under the provisions of the military-service act, 1916 (5 and 6 Geo. 5, ch. 104), which went into effect February 10, 1916, every male British subject, a resident of Great Britain, who had reached the age of 18 and was under 41 and was unmarried or a widower without children was deemed to have been duly enlisted in the regular army for general service with the colors or in the reserves for the period of the war.

The Statesman's Yearbook, 1918, page 50, states that all the groups of unmarried men were called out by March 18, 1916.

The military-service act, 1916, session 2 (6 and 7 Geo. 5, ch. 15), which became law May 25, 1916, extended the liability to service to married men within the same age limits. Section 1 (1) of this act contains the following proviso:

"Provided, That steps shall be taken to prevent, so far as possible, the sending of men to serve abroad before they attain the age of 19."

Premier Lloyd-George, in presenting to the House of Commons on April 9, 1918, the Government's bill raising the military age to 50, referred to this proviso, as follows:

"There was an understanding that boys under 19 years would only be used in case of emergency. We felt that the emergency had arisen, and, in so far as those who were over 18 were concerned, those who had already received six months' training, we felt it necessary that they should be sent to France."

By the terms of the recent treaty between the United States and Great Britain young men of British nationality may be drafted under the laws of the United States after they have reached the age of 20.

DRAFTING OF YOUNG MEN IN FRANCE.

I. BEFORE THE EUROPEAN WAR.

Under the military-service law in force before the outbreak of the European war, namely, the act of August 7, 1913, young men were called to military service during the year following that in which they reached 19 years of age, and the class to which they belonged was designated by the calendar year in which service under this law began—that is, the year in which the twentieth birthday occurred.

II. DURING THE EUROPEAN WAR.

This draft age for beginning compulsory military service was not lowered until March 15, 1915, when an act was passed providing that—

"The class of 1916 shall be called to the colors in advance of the regular time, at such date as may be fixed by order of the minister of war." (Journal Officiel, 1915, p. 1387.)

The class of 1916 consisted of young men who became 19 in 1915.

By the acts of December 30, 1915, March 31, 1917, and March 29, 1918 (Journal Officiel, 1915, p. 9663; 1917, p. 2557; 1918, p. 2831), the same authority was conferred upon the minister of war to call out the classes of 1917, 1918, and 1919, respectively, in the year in which they became 19.

Circulars of the minister of war, dated January 22, 1917, and September 30, 1917 (Journal Officiel, 1917, pp. 738, 7844), show that this authority had been exercised with respect to the class of 1917 before October 1, 1916, and, with respect to the class of 1918, before October 1, 1917. (A. Bernard, Aug. 21, 1918.)

DRAFTING YOUNG MEN IN GERMANY.

I. BEFORE THE EUROPEAN WAR.

Liability to military service in Germany commences with the completion of the seventeenth year. Such service is compulsory and universal, but does not actually begin until the age of 20. Every young man is enrolled in the military register during January of the year in which he completes his twentieth year. Prior to this—that is, from the seventeenth to the twentieth year, unless he has volunteered for actual service—the young man belongs to the landsturm, a home-defense force consisting of two classes, namely, the first including all men from 17 to 39 who for one reason or another have received no military training, the second class including all men over 39 up to 45, whether trained or untrained. (Constitution of the German Empire, Apr. 16, 1871, art. 59; law relating to military service, Feb. 11, 1888, secs. 23–24; Reichsgesetzblatt, 1888, p. 18.)

II. DURING THE EUROPEAN WAR.

The landsturm was called out for purposes of registration on August 1, 1914 (Reichsgesetzblatt, 1914, p. 273). Whether or not young men below the age of 20, except volunteers, were actually put into the military service at that time or later is not ascertainable from any official documents available in the Library of Congress. The following statement is given in Information Annual, 1916, page 259:

"According to the Lokal Anzeiger, of Berlin, June 18, all the 17-year-old boys in Germany had been ordered to report themselves to the military authorities. In Germany liability for military service begins at the age of 17 years, but in peace time actual service begins at 20."

The 1918 Statesman's Yearbook, at page 898, states that—

"By December, 1916, the whole of the 1917 class of recruits had been incorporated in the army, and by May, 1917, lads entering their seventeenth year."

The latter statement is ambiguous and does not indicate whether the 1917 class means those who completed their twentieth year or those who had completed their seventeenth year in 1917.

Nothing has been found in official sources to show that this service below the age of 20 was compulsory and not volunteer. The Berliner Tageblatt, August 22, 1914 (evening edition), page 4, contains an order of the military commander of Berlin to the effect that boys who have completed their sixteenth year may enroll for a course of military training under the instruction of retired army officers.

In a dispatch dated Paris, August 20, 1918, printed in the Washington Times on the same evening, it is stated that a number of boys of the 1919 class have been found among the latest prisoners, and that the proportion of boys taken in recent hauls indicates that practically all of the class of 1919 have been sent to the front. (T. H. Thiesing, Aug. 21, 1918.)

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 4. That section 5 of said act be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"That all male persons between the ages of 18 and 45, both inclusive, shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President, and upon proclamation by the President or other public notice given by him, or by his direction, stating the time or times and place or places of any such registration, it shall be the duty of all persons of the designated ages, except officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, the Navy, and the National Guard and Naval Militia while in the service of the United States, to present themselves for and submit to registration under the provisions of this act; and every such person shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of this act upon the publication of any such proclamation or any such other public notice as aforesaid given by his direction; and any person who shall willfully fail or refuse to present himself for registration or to submit thereto as herein provided shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction in a district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, and shall thereupon be duly registered: Provided, That in the call of the docket precedence shall be given in courts trying the same to the trial of criminal proceedings under this act: Provided further, That persons shall be subject to registration as herein provided who shall have attained their eighteenth birthday and who shall not have attained their forty-sixth birthday on or before the day set for the registration in any such proclamation by the President or any such other public notice given by him or by his direction; and all persons so registered shall be and remain subject to draft into the forces hereby authorized unless exempted or excused therefrom as in this act provided: Provided further, That the President may at such intervals as he may desire from time to time require all male persons who have attained the age of 18 years since the last preceding date of registration and on or before the next date set for registration by proclamation by the President, except such persons as are exempt from registration hereunder, to register in the same manner and subject to the same requirements and liabilities as those previously registered under the terms hereof: And provided further, That in the case of temporary absence from actual place of legal residence of any person liable to registration as provided herein, such registration may be made by mail under regulations to be prescribed by the President."

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

"Provided, That men registered under the provisions of this act who have served in the Navy of the United States shall, upon their own application, be permitted to reenlist in the naval service of the United States with and by the approval of the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, the reason I did not offer this amendment in committee was because it did not occur to me until I received a letter from a naval officer calling attention to the fact that if the law was enacted as drafted it would be impossible for a man who had heretofore served in the Navy and who would be valuable to the Navy, probably more valuable to the Navy than to the Army, to reenlist in the Navy, and that the men whose terms of enlistment in the Navy may hereafter expire who desire to reenlist could not taken even a 30 days' vacation before doing so. The only way they could reenlist would be to reenlist immediately before the draft, which they would have to do upon the completion of their service or run the risk of being immediately drafted into the military service.

I have no pride of opinion in the matter; I am offering it at the suggestion of a naval officer, and I think it is a splendid suggestion.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. Under this law all men who had reached the ages between 18 and 45 will be within the draft ages, and therefore they could not enlist, but can only be taken into the Navy or a branch of the Army by induction. Is it not true that the Secretary of War, when I asked him the question whether he did not think the draft ought to apply to the Navy, said he was not prepared to say whether it should or not, but he was satisfied that he and the Secretary of the Navy could work out a satisfactory plan?

Mr. FIELDS. The gentleman will understand that this is not drafting anybody into the Navy; it is giving a man the option to reenlist in the Navy. For instance, the man serving in the Navy to-day who is within a few months of the expiration of his term of enlistment and who may have served there for a number of years, may desire to reenlist, but may also desire to take a brief vacation, say, of 30 days before doing so; and if some protection is not given him he will have to register immediately upon retirement from the Navy, which may make it impossible for him to reenlist, notwithstanding the fact that he may be a most valuable man in the Navy.

If they should register and draft him into the military service it would be almost impossible for him to get back to the Navy, for the gentleman knows that hard-and-fast rule in the War Department that no man can be transferred without the approval of his commanding officer. So they get him in the Military Establishment. He may apply for permission to be transferred into the Navy, but he is a good man and his commanding officer says no, that he is a good-looking fellow and that he wants him, and therefore will not approve his application for transfer to the Navy, and he is estopped. This amendment will make it possible for him to be transferred to the Navy. I have provided that it shall only be done, of course, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy. Therefore, if the Navy shall not need him, or if he is not eligible, is not physically fit, the Secretary of the Navy would not approve his application for reenlistment into the naval service, and any objection that might arise from that quarter is removed by the fact that he can only enter the Navy by and with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, and I hope the gentleman will not oppose the amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE. I simply desire to ask the gentleman, What will be the status of the men discharged from the Navy under his amendment? Suppose there are 2,000 men discharged from the Navy on the 1st day of September who are within the provisions of this draft law. Are these men immune from service?

Mr. FIELDS. Not at all.

Mr. McKENZIE. Suppose the Secretary of the Navy says that he has all the men he needs and he does not need any more men?

Mr. FIELDS. Then they would not get the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, and they would have to go into the new draft, of course.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman understand that there is any such thing as a transfer from the Army to the Navy?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes; once in a while; but it is very hard to get through.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think there is any such thing. A man must be discharged from the Army, and then he enlists in the Navy.

Mr. FIELDS. Technically, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. CLARK of Florida to the amendment offered by Mr. FIELDS:

"That for a period of 30 days after the passage and approval of this act any person who is within the draft age as specified herein shall be permitted to enlist in the Marine Corps, the Navy, or the Army of the United States, notwithstanding any existing law or regulation of any department or Executive order now in force or hereafter issued."

[Cries of "Vote! Vote!"]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, no; I think you will be quiet for a moment or two. It is all well enough for gentlemen to cry "Vote! Vote!" Of course, I know they are in a hurry. The edict has been issued, the decree has gone forth, the sacrifice must be made and made in a hurry. It is well known that the War Department issued orders which absolutely prohibited any American citizen from enlisting in the naval service or in the Marine Corps if he desired to do so. Every man and every boy between the ages of 18 and 45 is to be drafted into the Army. What are you going to do for men in the Navy? How are you going to fill up the Marine Corps? How are you going to take care of these two important branches of the service, and, if we are to believe the newspaper reports, one of them, the most important branch when it comes to the real work on the battle field—the Marine Corps. It seems to me that these men ought to be given the privilege of tendering their service, if they desire to do so, to the Government of the United States in that branch of our fighting forces in which they feel they can render better service to the Government. I heard the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] say the other day that the volunteer system had departed from America forever. That may be true.

Mr. KAHN. I did not say that, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I beg the gentleman's pardon——

Mr. KAHN. I said I hoped it had gone forever.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from California that he should get permission of the gentleman who has the floor before interrupting him.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Of course I yield.

Mr. KAHN. I said I hoped that the volunteer system had been displaced forever. I did not say it had been.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will accept the gentleman's statement. I understood him the other way. Of course if he did not say it, he did not say it, but he said he hoped it would be. I want to say that, although we have adopted the draft system and we are supporting it, the fact remains, and it can not be denied, that it is objectionable to hundreds of thousands of American citizens who desire the privilege of volunteering to serve their country under the flag. To be drafted, sugar-coat it as you please, talk about its being "selective" as you please, is distasteful to a great many people in this country, people who prefer to go voluntarily and tender their services in the branch of the service where they are better fitted in their own judgment to serve. Why not give these men the privilege of doing that? Why not for 30 days let down the bars and say, "If you want to enlist, and you come within the age, tender yourself at a recruiting station and offer your services to the Government." What is the objection to that? It certainly does not delay the proceedings. It is not going to delay the Army for a moment to have these men come up voluntarily and offer to enlist.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. For a question.

Mr. GREGG. If this law passes, every boy that is large enough to be out of short breeches and every man up to 45 will be in the Army.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. All except these preferred clerks in the Government departments here in Washington.

Mr. GREGG. What are we going to do for the Navy and the Marine Corps if something like the gentleman's amendment does not pass?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have just asked that. Where are you going to replenish them, where are you going to get them?

Mr. GREGG. I understand they need 300,000 men by the first of the year.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask to proceed for two minutes more.

Mr. GREGG. I ask unanimous consent that he be given five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like to make a suggestion. We recently passed a statute authorizing the Marine Corps to increase by voluntary enlistment up to 80,500.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If this draft act passes with no exception or limitation upon its regulation what are you going to do with the Marine Corps? Change that law?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. You can not do it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does not the gentleman believe the volunteer system so far as it applies to the Marine Corps has been the life, the blood, and the glory of the Marine Corps?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Absolutely, and has made it a glorious success. [Applause.]

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. For a question; I have not much time.

Mr. FIELDS. I want to ask the gentleman or the gentleman from Virginia——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I can not yield time for the gentleman to interrogate the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FIELDS. Does the gentleman believe the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy would make it impossible for men to enlist in the Navy if it was necessary?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I am getting sick and tired of taking things on faith. Every time when these gentlemen are driven into a hole they say, "Have not you got confidence in the President and in the Secretary of War?" [Applause.] My God, we are here to legislate, are we not? We are here as Representatives to exercise our own judgment with what little gray matter God Almighty gives us, if he gave us any, and yet whenever you get into a hole somewhere you fall back upon the proposition that the President as Commander in Chief must be trusted. Yes; a whole lot of other people can be trusted. Let me tell you an Executive order was issued on the 8th of this month absolutely prohibiting further enlistment in any service, and I went to the department down here to see Gen. Barnett about a young man being taken into the Marine Corps who had made application in April or June, whose papers were filed, who had been accepted by Gen. Barnett to be called when needed, and whose services Gen. Barnett very much desired, because his papers showed that he was a competent man and a man who would render very effective service there; and when we went up to the War Department to get their consent they said, "No," and now they propose to take them all. We sit here and propose to allow the department not only to execute the law but absolutely to make it, and you know it, you know it.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho rose.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I can not yield. I am getting tired of it myself. I know that I am not going to change anybody's opinion. I know that I can not affect a single solitary human being on the floor of this House, because the cards have been fixed, the decree has been issued, and the head is bowed to the yoke, and you know it as well as I do. There is no use in camouflaging about this business. I want to say that, so far as I am concerned myself, I do not criticize anybody else. I am not questioning the motives of a single human being on earth. God knows I love my brethren in this House. Oh, it is delightful to be with them and see and associate with the most magnificent lot of gentlemen I ever saw. I am simply the keeper of my own conscience, and I am not going to bed at night with any quarrel with my own conscience. I am going to vote on every one of these propositions as I see it, regardless of all the letters that ever were written or that will be written. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will not the gentleman from Florida modify his amendment striking out the provision for enlistment in the Army and leaving it the Marine Corps and Navy——

Mr. GALLIVAN. And Naval Reserve.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to so modify it as to leave the Army out and leave in the Navy and Marine Corps and add Naval Reserve.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to leave out that portion relating to the Army and add to it the Naval Reserve. Is there objection?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I did not hear the first part of the gentleman's speech and I would like to ask why this modification?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Well, I am not responsible for that.

Mr. LANGLEY. Of course not, but neither am I. I was called out of the Chamber by a constituent and the gentleman had offered his amendment and had begun his remarks before my return. What I desire to ask the gentleman from Florida is, Why does he propose to exclude the Army from his amendment?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I was requested by some gentlemen who think it probably best to do that and let the Army regulate their own affairs.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am not going to object to the gentleman's request, in view of his explanation, but I would like to make a brief statement, if it will not interrupt the course of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I shall be glad to yield a moment or two to my friend from Kentucky if I have the time.

Mr. LANGLEY. Just an observation or two. I conferred with my friend from Florida in the preparation of this amendment and he knows, of course, that I heartily favor its purpose. I agree with what the gentleman has said and I had intended to speak in favor of the amendment, seeking recognition in my own right under the rules; but since the House seems impatient for a vote and since my friend has kindly given me this opportunity to go on record in support of the amendment, I shall not seek such recognition. I know personally that what the gentleman has said about men preferring to enlist rather than to be drafted is absolutely true, and when men feel that way about it I can not understand why they are denied the privilege of voluntary enlistment. Men above 40 years of age who are covered by this bill have not had a chance to volunteer, while others have, and I think they ought to have that opportunity. I know personally many men above 40 who tried to enlist but were not permitted to do so, and yet they are put in the attitude, by this bill, of being forced into the service, when as a matter of fact they would have gone in long ago if they had had the chance. Indeed, I think it would be well to go even further than this amendment proposes, and allow men, even though they have reached 50 years of age, to enlist if they are physically fit for service, as many of them are. I know, as the gentleman from Florida has said, that the cards are stacked, that the door for volunteers is closed, and that this argument as well as his is useless, but I want to go on record as advocating what I believe to be just and fair to all, and I thank my friend for giving me this opportunity of doing so.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do want to give the American citizen the right to enlist in the Marine Corps and in the Naval Reserve Force and the Navy if he sees fit to do so.

Mr. Chairman, it is seldom that I take up the time to make a speech on this floor, and much more seldom that I avail myself of the privilege graciously granted by the House to extend my remarks in the RECORD and print as a part of my speech a lot of things not uttered by me on the floor, and I will gladly vote at any time to allow nothing printed in the RECORD except the actual proceedings of the House. However, as permission has been granted me in this instance, and as I could not secure sufficient time to give oral expression to my views on this very important bill, affecting as it does the future of the youth of my country, I intend to add a few thoughts to what I have been able to say in the eight minutes I have actually used.

Certain newspapers, certain gentlemen upon this floor, and numbers of men occupying bomb-proof positions, who, in all probability, no matter how long this war may last, will never smell gunpowder, have acquired the habit of attempting to brand as traitors to our country any public official or citizen who dares to entertain and express any opinion of his own on any proposed question of public policy. So far as I am concerned, I do not believe there is a single Member of this House who does not desire with all his heart and soul to win this war against Germany and her allies in the shortest possible time. I am sure that every Member of this House will cheerfully vote to expend every dollar and sacrifice every male inhabitant of the Republic necessary to carry Old Glory to victory or the battle fields of Europe. But each of us has taken a solemn oath to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States and to discharge our duties as Representatives of a free people as God Almighty has given us the brain and the light to comprehend and see those duties and not as some one else, charged with other duties and responsibilities, may see and understand them.

As a Representative in this great body when my country is involved in war, I am perfectly willing to make my judgment subservient to the judgment of those trained in military affairs in all questions of purely a military nature, or in all matters the solution of which requires expert military knowledge, but when it comes to determine whether the battles of the war shall be fought and won by the matured men or the young boys of the land, I respectfully, but firmly, decline to allow these military gentlemen to settle that question for me. I am utterly and unalterably opposed to drafting into the Army and sending to the front any youth under the age of 21 years until the man power of the country has been depleted to a point which makes this step necessary. When that time shall arrive (and God grant it never may) I shall cheerfully and promptly vote to send every boy and every old man who is able to carry a gun. Can any reasonable man object to this position? Does the taking of this position indicate any lack of patriotism or loyalty to country?

I desire to say to gentlemen who are given to aspersing, at least by insinuation, the patriotic spirit of others that the same blood which courses through my veins has answered the call to battle in every foreign war in which this country has been engaged, beginning with that of the Revolution. Can these self-appointed critics point to a prouder record of patriotic devotion to country than that? I have voted for every dollar of appropriation which the administration has asked to carry on this war; I voted for the declaration of war against Germany and against Austria-Hungary, and I have been fully convinced for some time that we should declare war against Bulgaria and Turkey and every power with which any one of our devoted allies is at war. I have voted for every measure which the President has requested to aid in bringing success to our arms save the original draft law alone, and in that case I would have done violence to my conscience under my oath of office had I voted differently, denying my fellow citizens the time-honored American privilege of volunteering to defend their country.

Although conscientiously and unalterably opposed to sending minors to fight the battles of the country until the depletion of the man power was such as to make such action necessary I voted for this bill solely because I did not propose to be put in the attitude of apparent objection to the increase of our fighting forces beyond the seas. While the advocates of drafting the 18, 19, and 20 year old boys solemnly assure us that these will be called last, and not then until actually needed, that the purpose is to train and educate them, we should not deceive ourselves. These tender boys will be called first or along with the others, and will be on the firing line in Europe by the early summer of next year.

Only two classes of people in this country can be benefited by this early impressment of these youths in the military service.

Those two classes are the manufacturers and other employers of labor who are vitally interested in keeping their employees out of the service, and a certain class of workers who have shown their patriotism during this gigantic struggle, in which the very life of the Nation is at stake, by threatening to go on strikes, although receiving the highest wages ever before paid in the history of the world.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for any and every measure intended to hasten a victorious conclusion of this war. Autocracy must perish from among men, and it devolves upon America to carry the flag of democracy to triumph. This is the one great object all of us should keep constantly in mind; but we should in all things remember the brave boys across the seas who are willingly giving their lives to perpetuate the principles of democracy and who have demonstrated to all the world that America is unselfish and her sons are unconquerable.

While the soldiery of this Republic is so gloriously upholding the honor of the flag on foreign soil the "holier than thou" gang, living safely and securely at home, might find better employment than questioning the patriotism of those among us who believe that under the Constitution they have the right to entertain some opinions of their own, and who dare to have the courage to express them. America is in this war to win, and there should be no peace until the allied flags shall float over the palace of the Kaiser at Berlin. When complete and overwhelming victory is ours, we should dictate the terms of peace free from any suggestion from any of the defenders of autocracy, and this we will do; but to reach this glorious end our course must be guided by reason, we must think, we must deliberate, we must confer together as freemen bound together in a common cause. In this crucial period in the history of the Nation all bickering should cease, suspicion should be banished, insinuation should hide its infamous head, and all real Americans should say to one another, "Come and let us reason together."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WALSH. I seek recognition when the gentleman from Florida has concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was going to have the amendment as modified read. The Clerk will now read the amendment as modified by the request of the gentleman from Florida.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. CLARK of Florida for the amendment offered by Mr. FIELDS: At the end of line 16, on page 5, add the following: "That for a period of 30 days after the passage and approval of this act any person who is within the draft age as specified herein shall be permitted to enlist in the Marine Corps, Navy, or Naval Reserve of the United States, notwithstanding any existing law or regulation of any department or Executive order now in force or hereafter issued."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Florida has made a few very interesting observations upon what the terms of the draft law are. He is always interesting in his remarks and always displays a high degree of courage. It may be possible that the draft law is distasteful and unsatisfactory to hundreds of thousands of people in this country, although I doubt it, and it may be that in the gentleman's community they have not yet finished sulking and trying to throw discredit upon the action of this Congress in passing this sort of law.

But, sir, I think I voice the general opinion of the people of the United States when I say that they are not only satisfied with the law and the manner in which it has been administered, but that it has been a marvel not only to our own people but to the people of the entire world [applause] in that we have been able to raise and put into the field—yes, and to put upon the field of Europe even—over 1,000,000 of men armed and equipped. It may be that those who were against the war in the beginning, who believed we were not justified in entering this struggle, are still of that opinion, and if that be so in the gentleman's section of the country, of course they will still oppose the draft law and grumble and complain at the manner in which it has been executed and administered.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to say that the people in my section or myself are opposing the draft law.

Mr. WALSH. I do not say that the people of the gentleman's section are opposing it, but the gentleman here upon the floor stands as spokesman of those who were opposed to the draft law—unwittingly, I am content to assume—and who now say that it is unsatisfactory and distasteful.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say to the gentleman that I bow with all due propriety and humility to Congress in the adoption of the draft law, and I have stood by it. My people have responded just as fully and completely as the gentleman's, and, although much older than he, I am ready to respond with the gentleman any time when our services are needed or when they may be taken.

Mr. WALSH. I stated at the beginning that I admire the gentleman's courage; but, sir, this is no time in the Congress for anybody to stand here and express views that are held by those who are not with the country in this struggle and who are not seeking to uphold us and further the prosecution of this war. [Applause.] And to complain and say that the draft law is distasteful and unsatisfactory to hundreds of thousands of our people can only give comfort and satisfaction to that class of people.

Now, as to the gentleman's proposed amendment. He would seek for a period of 30 days to permit enlistments by volunteering in the Marine Corps and the Navy. Now, I do not know whether the Secretary of the Navy has asked for this legislation or whether it was considered by the Military Affairs Committee or not. But it would seem to me that the Commander in Chief, that the military authorities, and the Secretary of the Navy, knowing that this legislation was under consideration, would hardly have permitted it to approach this stage of proceeding unless they had given expression to their views and unless they were satisfied that it would obstruct filling up the ranks of the Navy and the Marine Corps. I believe that the Commander in Chief knows the condition with reference to those branches of the service, and that if there be need for further enlistment they must have some plan in mind, even under the operation of this law which it is proposed to enact, whereby they can secure, under regulations or otherwise, the men needed in the Marine Corps and the Navy. So, sir, I think without that consideration by those departments we ought to go a little slow before we amend this measure in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word.

Mr. DENT. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. CALDWELL. Not over a minute; two minutes at the outside.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that at the conclusion of one minute of discussion by the gentleman from New York all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto be concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that at the termination of one minute of discussion by the gentleman from New York all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto be concluded. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, before this bill was proposed we had a draft statute, and under that a regulation was established by which men in the draft age were permitted to enlist in the Navy and the Marine Corps with the consent of their local board. It is the policy and intention of the War Department to apply the same regulations to the new draft ages, and the only reason why the door was shut for a few days was to prevent the scandal of men trying to get from under. That is all. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FIELDS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, can not the amendment be read?

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I think many Members do not know what they are voting on, and I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the amendment may be read again at the desk. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 96, noes 44.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I would like to submit.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report from the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH: On page 4, line 8, after the word "States," insert the following: "and officers and members of the uniformed police forces who are now employed as such in and by cities having 500,000 inhabitants or more."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH] be given 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] asks unanimous consent that his colleague may be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment, as its tenor denotes, is to prevent the further depletion and disruption of the trained and experienced police forces in those cities where the population is very large and conspicuously mixed in character.

The truth is that in the cities covered by this amendment there are hundreds of thousands of enemy aliens and unscrupulous adventurers, ever ready in a critical time like this to incite trouble and disorder, especially when they know that the protective force has been reduced and weakened.

In a great city like New York, which is renowned for the splendid efficiency of its police force, should the draft age be raised to 45, and this amendment rejected, over 50 per cent, or 6,000 policemen, would be put into the Army. This would mean not only a grave reduction in the protection of life and property in a city of 6,000,000 inhabitants, but it would mean that the city would have to pay about $7,000,000 a year to the policemen inducted into the military service, because of a State law which provides that city and State employees must be paid the difference between their Army or Navy pay and their other pay.

The seriousness of this police situation can not be exaggerated. It is one that does not only affect the interests of the city of New York but it also affects the interests of the Nation and the prosecution of the war.

Imagine what the effect would be—world-wide—if in the city of New York, the first city in the land, the gateway to the Nation, there should be an uprising resulting in violence, and destruction of life and property, and the police should be unable, because of numerical weakness, promptly to suppress it. It would be a national disaster, and one that would gladden the hearts of our enemies and injure the morale of our splendid Army across the sea.

There are those who believe—and they are many—that the existing trained and efficient police forces who are protecting the lives and properties of our citizens throughout the country are rendering as great and as necessary a service in their respective fields to the Government, the Nation, and the people as if they were put into the Army.

After all is said and done, neither the Army nor the Navy alone can win this war. This war will be won because of the patriotic zeal and devotion, the unselfish and constant cooperation of the men, women, and children, who sense the issues involved and who gratefully appreciate the blessings, bounties, and opportunities of this free land of ours. In the language of Kipling:

> It ain't the guns nor armament nor the funds they can pay,
> But the close cooperation that makes them win the day.
> It ain't the individuals nor the army as a whole,
> But the everlastin' teamwork of every bloomin' soul.

[Applause.]

If I do not exhaust your patience, I shall read a letter from the mayor of the city of New York:

CITY OF NEW YORK, OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
August 9, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS F. SMITH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have the honor to invite your attention to conditions now confronting the administration of police affairs in the city of New York by reason of the drafts upon members of the police force under existing and proposed military draft laws. The existing law calls all members of the police force from 21 to 31 to the colors. All the men on the existing civil service list are of conscription age, and, consequently, should they be appointed, they become almost immediately a liability upon the city, without having rendered any appreciable service.

Already more than 700 men have been drafted, and before the end of this year at least 1,000 will have been drafted into the military service, and ultimately 28 per cent of the entire force, or 3,000 men, will be called.

Should the Government raise the draft age to 45 years virtually every able-bodied policeman in this city will be, sooner or later, taken into the Army. Policemen of this city physically fit will be called before civilians with dependents, because they can not claim exemption from a monetary standpoint, since under the provisions of the Fenner law the city pays them the difference between the salary they get as policemen and the salary they get as members of the Army.

An efficient policeman can not be made in a brief period; a year or two is required to bring about this result. If we are to be compelled to recruit the police force of this city in this most trying period of its history from the utterly green, and perhaps thoroughly undesirable, material left over from the draft we are courting disaster.

The possibility of disorder, due to labor unrest; the fomenting of disturbance by enemy alien elements; possible uprising against authority, due to dissatisfaction with the war or the Government by reason of insufficient, improper, or unacceptable food, or due to the high cost of food and clothing, or increased burdens, may, under certain circumstances, burst into an appalling reality.

The arguments advanced that no exception can be made in New York City regarding drafting of policemen, because to do so would mean that every other city in the country would be justified in making similar demands, should have no weight. New York City is in a class by itself. It is the financial center of the world; from it radiates all activities looking toward the speedy and satisfactory conclusion of the war. This is not true of any other city in this country. Riots or disturbances in this city, improperly handled and ineffectively quelled, would be a national disaster that would be pleasing to the enemy and would certainly demand the attention of the Government.

New York is the gateway of American commerce; it is the pulse of this hemisphere and from it is judged the Nation's vigor and determination. It is unthinkable that the police force of this city should be otherwise than up to the highest standard in these momentous times, when unprecedented emergencies are bound to arise.

Moreover, the city of New York is made up of many foreign elements. At least 75,000 enemy aliens, male and female, and hundreds of thousands of citizens of the Teutonic race, against whom demonstrations may be expected under certain conditions, make up a considerable part of our cosmopolitan population.

The war activities in this city and our cooperation with the Federal Government has made unusual demands upon the police force of this city. To make further inroads upon this very much depleted force, which may not be recruited with proper material, is a matter worthy of serious consideration.

I therefore feel it is my duty to request the Representatives of this city and State in Congress to secure such modification of the existing statutes as will meet this very important and dangerous condition, for I am certain it can not be to the best interest of the Government, considering all New York City means to the Nation, to destroy, or seriously restrict, the efficiency of the police force of this city. A policeman can render much better service to the Government by good police duty in this city than he can by entering the military service.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN F. HYLAN, Mayor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. I think I can conclude in three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. This letter is from the chamber of commerce:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,
New York, August 21, 1918.

DEAR SIR: The city of New York is a pivotal point, both in manufacturing and in the shipment of men, munitions, and Army supplies of all kinds.

Its preservation from disturbances, outbreaks of violence, of outrages by enemy aliens, of fire or other disaster is of vital importance to the war efforts of the Nation.

Because of its size, its activities, and its importance, and the heterogeneous character of its population and because it is the biggest labor market in the United States it is the center to which adventurous spirits of all kinds resort.

All of this makes it one of the most difficult, as it is one of the most necessary, places to which to give the very best possible security and protection.

The police force of this city is renowned for its efficiency in the protection of life and property. It has acquired that reputation as the result of long training and a remarkable esprit de corps among its men.

This force has been already seriously depleted by the draft. Eight hundred of its membership have gone into military service, or about 8 per cent of the number.

Unless provisions are made in the new draft act to exempt the trained police force it may easily lose 50 per cent of its personnel.

The seriousness of this can not be magnified, not so much to the city of New York per se as to the vital interests of the Nation in the conduct of the war.

Men can not be trained quickly to a knowledge of the laws under which the police have to act and to their duties. Green men can be much more quickly trained to be efficient soldiers of the line than to be trained and efficient policemen.

The value of the existing trained force of police in their present position and carrying on their present duties is worth vastly more to the interests of the Government and to the country while at war than the military value would be of the entire trained force if it was put into the Army as a unit. Indeed this force is worth immensely more to the Government where it is in the protection of the vast industries and functions being performed here than many times their numerical number as soldiers of the line.

We do not hesitate to urge upon you the most earnest consideration of these views and the adoption of a provision in the draft act which will exempt this force.

If it is taken away or largely depleted by the draft, it can only be recruited from men past middle age not then fitted by adaptability or physical qualities for the responsible and strenuous life of a policeman. To so deteriorate the protective force of this important war base would be taking a hazard which we believe a careful military commander would not consider justified.

We are,

Yours, very respectfully,

WELDING RING, Chairman,
CLEVELAND H. DODGE,
E. H. OUTERBRIDGE,
CHARLES L. BERNHEIMER,
HENRY A. CAESAR,
SAMUEL W. FAIRCHILD,
LEONOR F. LOREE,
Of the Executive Committee.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I would like to know from the gentleman from New York what cities are included in his amendment?

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. There are about 12, with a total population of 16,000,000, and a total police force of 32,000.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Is it possible to name those cities now?

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. Yes. They are Baltimore, Boston, Buffalo, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit, Los Angeles, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, San Francisco, and New York.

Mr. CANNON. Can you not put in Danville? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CALDWELL. I do so for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the police situation here in the city of Washington. By reason of the draft, the police force here has been depleted to such an extent that it has been necessary to send to the adjoining camps and get inexperienced men there to come here and do soldiers' duty as policemen, and they are paying them out of the Washington city treasury. Under the circumstances it is only right and fair that the great centers of industry in this country should be protected by relieving them with respect to the police force.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not true that we are losing the police force in Washington because of a failure to give any increase in their salaries?

Mr. CALDWELL. Possibly so. They ought to have all the salary they want.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. CALDWELL. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 113.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 5, after line 16, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 4. That during the present emergency the minimum age limit of officers of the Army of the United States, not above the rank of captain, shall be 18 years."

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. GREGG. I thought that was a section by itself.

The CHAIRMAN. This is an amendment of the committee.

Mr. GREGG. It is an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREGG: Amend section 4 by inserting after the words "United States," at the end of line 18, page 5, the following: "and of the Marine Corps."

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that is simply to make uniform the age limit of the officers in the Army and the officers in the Marine Corps.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman give us the information of what the age limit is in the Navy?

Mr. GREGG. I could not say that. You see the officers of the Navy are specially trained, technical men.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Marine Corps is part of the naval force.

Mr. GREGG. I know; but the Navy is technically trained.

Mr. STAFFORD. If we are going to have captains of 18 in the Marine Corps, in the Navy they would not be eligible.

Mr. BLACK. It is 20 years in the Navy.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Under the existing law with respect to the Marine Corps it is 20 years.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREGG. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I defer to the chairman, but I thought the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG] had the floor. Has the gentleman from Texas any suggestion from people in authority in the Navy Department recommending this change and giving any reason?

Mr. GREGG. I have none at all. It was my own suggestion. I wanted to make uniform the age limit of the men in the Marine Corps and that of the men in the Army. They are both the land fighting forces in our Military Establishment.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Exactly. I did not want to impugn the character of the gentleman's amendment, but the amount of information he brought in with it. That is all. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREGG. No; it was simply a matter of my own suggestion.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. You are not quite certain that by making the ages uniform you make the effect uniform?

Mr. GREGG. I do not see why in two fighting corps the age limit should be different—that is, that they should be a certain age in one and a different age in the other—and they are the two fighting corps.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It all depends upon the character of the organization, and the particular part of the fighting that they are called on to do.

Mr. GREGG. They are doing the same fighting that the Army is doing.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not so understand it. I understand they have also a quasi aquatic experience.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment which has been reported as section 4.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to come in as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HAYDEN: Page 5, after line 19, insert as a new section the following:

"The wife of a soldier or sailor serving in the present war shall not be disqualified for any position or appointment under the Government because she is a married woman."

Mr. MADDEN. She is not now.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the necessity for the amendment that I have just offered was brought to my attention by Hon. Sam F. Webb, of Phoenix, Ariz., who wrote me the following letter:

OFFICE OF COUNTY TREASURER AND TAX COLLECTOR, MARICOPA COUNTY, ARIZ.,
Phoenix, Ariz., July 24, 1918.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

FRIEND CARL: Last spring my daughter, Miss Emma, took the civil-service examination with 18 other applicants, and her rating, as shown, was third on the list of those who passed the examination. On June 7 she married Chester Sylvester, to whom she had been engaged for over one year and one-half. Mr. Sylvester enlisted here in Phoenix last April a year ago as a private in the United States Army, choosing the Signal Service for employment. By careful and diligent service he has been promoted from the private ranks to the position of sergeant-major in the Fifty-first Telephone Battalion, Signal Corps, recently at Fort Sam Houston, Tex.; I say recently for the reason that his company and associates were undergoing quarantine last Friday preparatory for going "Somewhere." My daughter returned here on Sunday morning to remain until victory crowns our arms in Europe and her husband either returns as a hero or passes over to the home of our illustrious dead who faced death on the field of battle that freedom should not perish from this earth.

After my daughter's marriage she was requested to inform the postal authorities when it would be convenient for her to enter the service. Her reply was about August 1, signing her name as she should, Mrs. Chester Sylvester. In reply to her letter, she received the inclosed document, which you will observe appears to be a civil-service statement. I, however, term it an uncivil service, if it persists in prohibiting the employment of married women in the United States Postal Service whose husbands are in the United States Army willing, if duty requires, to lay down their lives in defense of this land of equal opportunities and equal privileges.

I wired you recently in regard to the impropriety of such regulations and now inclose the document upon which I based my telegram.

After you have digested the contents of this remarkable document, kindly return it to me, as I would like to preserve the same for future use.

By giving this matter your early attention, I trust the name of Mrs. Chester H. Sylvester, nee Miss Emma A. Webb, will be restored to the list of eligibles for appointment in the United States Postal Service.

Very respectfully,

SAM F. WEBB.

On receipt of this complaint from my constituent I investigated the matter and found that the postal regulations forbade the appointment of married women as employees in that department.

Mr. MADDEN. That may be so in the Post Office Department, but they are putting them in every day in all the branches of the Government here. There are 10,000 wives of soldiers in the departments.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman from Illinois may be right, but this is section 157 of the Postal Regulations. I shall read it to the committee:

A married woman will not be appointed to a classified position in the Postal Service, and a classified woman employee in the Postal Service who shall change her name by marriage will not be reappointed.

I then wrote to the Post Office Department and received the following reply:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 24, 1918.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HAYDEN: I have your letter of the 20th instant, with inclosure, from Hon. Sam F. Webb, relative to the employment of the wives of soldiers in the Postal Service.

In reply I wish to advise you that a woman employee in the Postal Service who marries a man in the Army or Navy may retain her position until her husband receives his honorable discharge. In view of this fact and the present conditions in post offices, the Civil Service Commission has been informed that the department will modify the provisions of section 157 of the Postal Laws and Regulations for the duration of the war in order to allow women whose husbands or sons are in the military or naval service of the United States to take the clerk-carrier examination.

The inclosure is returned herewith.

Very truly, yours,

J. C. KOONS,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

With this assurance from the First Assistant Postmaster General, I felt sure that Mrs. Sylvester would be able to obtain the position for which she had qualified, but, to be certain about it, I wrote a letter to the Civil Service Commission. The following reply from the president of the commission gives the reasons why the recommendation of the Post Office Department was not approved:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 7, 1918.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HAYDEN: I am in receipt of your letter of July 29, inclosing a telegram and letter from Hon. Samuel F. Webb, of Phoenix, Ariz., together with a copy of a letter from the First Assistant Postmaster General relative to the employment in the Post Office Service of married women who have either husbands or sons in the military or naval service of the United States, with particular reference to the eligibility of Mr. Webb's daughter, Mrs. Emma Webb Sylvester, who passed an examination for the Phoenix, Ariz., post office last March, and who subsequently married Chester Sylvester, who has enlisted in the military service and is now a sergeant major in the Signal Service.

Mr. Webb complains of the fact that his daughter is in receipt of a document which appears to be a civil-service statement prohibiting the employment of married women in the Postal Service, which he believes to be unjust with respect to women whose husbands are in the military service. He therefore requests that an effort be made to modify the regulation, and that the name of Mrs. Sylvester be restored to the eligible register.

In reply I have to advise you that the regulation prohibiting the appointment of married women to a classified position in the Postal Service is a departmental regulation of long standing, but a communication under date of July 12 has been received from the Postmaster General in which the commission is advised that owing to present conditions the department has decided to allow women employees who marry men in the Army to retain their positions until their husbands return from military duty, and therefore it has been decided that during the present war the provisions of section 157 of the postal laws and regulations shall not apply to married women who have either husbands or sons in the military or naval service of the United States, and it is desired in such cases that married women be allowed to take the examination for post-office clerk or city letter carrier.

The commission, however, has advised the department that its policy above outlined would establish a preferred class of the persons indicated, and would work a restriction against the admission of married women in general to the examinations—the legality of which course is questionable—and that therefore the action proposed by the department is not approved by the commission.

Very truly,

JOHN A. MCILHENNY.

In view of the position taken by the Civil Service Commission, it is evident that there must be action by Congress if the wives of our soldiers and sailors are to be permitted to obtain employment in the Postal Service. No good reason can be advanced against the passage of this legislation, and I believe that it is a proper amendment to the pending bill. I might add that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs in reporting the man-power bill to the Senate recommended the adoption of a similar amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 5, after line 19, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War is authorized to assign to educational institutions, for special and technical training, soldiers who enter the military service under the provisions of this act in such numbers and under such regulations as he may prescribe; and is authorized to contract with such educational institutions for the subsistence, quarters, and military and academic instruction of such soldiers.

Funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated for quarters and subsistence of the Army shall be available for payments to educational institutions under the contracts above authorized, including the cost of military and academic instruction."

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. On yesterday, in my address before the House I made the statement that the young man of 16 could not go to war until he was 18. That statement of fact was denied by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON], I think, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILSON]. These gentlemen insisted that a boy 16 or 17 could join the Army with the parents' consent. I insisted that no one under 18 years of age could be enlisted in the Army. I requested from The Adjutant General a citation of the law, and he has given this in a memorandum for the Secretary of War. I wish to include this correspondence as a part of my remarks without reading, unless some one desires to have them read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a communication from The Adjutant General. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The correspondence is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 23, 1918.

Hon. GEORGE R. LUNN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LUNN: In accordance with your telephonic request, I inclose you herewith memorandum from The Adjutant General relating to the ages at which men are permitted to enter the military service. Your interest, as I understand it, was primarily in the minimum age, so this memorandum has failed to make mention of the fact that under recent legislation the Staff Corps of the Army are permitted to take men up to 55 years of age, thus increasing the maximum for certain corps of the Army, but not reducing the minimum.

Cordially, yours,

STANLEY KING,
Private Secretary.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
August 23, 1918.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War:

Prior to the enactment of the national-defense act the law governing the ages of recruits for enlistment was embodied in sections 1116 and 1118, Revised Statutes, the former providing that recruits enlisting in the Army must be between the ages of 18 and 35 years at the time of their enlistment, this limitation as to ages not applying to soldiers re-enlisting. Section 1118 provides that no minor under the age of 16 years shall be enlisted into the military service. The national-defense act of June 3, 1916 (Public, No. 85, Sixty-fourth Congress, H. R. 12766), provides in section 27 that no person under the age of 18 years shall be enlisted into the military service without the written consent of his parents or guardians, provided that such minor has such parents or guardians entitled to his custody and control. The act of May 18, 1917 (Public No. 12, Sixty-fifth Congress, H. R. 3545), provides in section 7 that the qualifications and conditions of voluntary enlistment as herein provided shall be the same as those prescribed by existing law for enlistments in the Regular Army, except that recruits must be between the ages of 18 and 40 years, both inclusive, at the time of their enlistment. Section 2 of the same act provides that the enlisted men required to raise and maintain the organizations of the Regular Army and to complete and maintain the organizations embodying the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States at the maximum legal strength as by this act provided shall be raised by voluntary enlistment, etc. These two sections taken together require that all voluntary enlistments in the Regular Army, except in cases of men of prior service, shall be of applicants between the ages of 18 and 40 years, both inclusive. Since the date of the approval of this act, May 18, 1917 no recruits have been enlisted in the Regular Army under 18 years of age unless the applicant has falsely represented his age to be 18 when he was in fact under that age.

P. C. HARRIS,
Acting The Adjutant General.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FULLER of Illinois: At the end of line 2, page 6, strike out the period and insert a comma and add the following: "and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to cause any honorably discharged soldier of the Army of the United States who was or shall have been under the age of 21 years at the date of his enrollment or the beginning of his service, to be educated in a university, college, or in a vocational or technical school, at the expense of the Government of the United States, with the object of rendering such honorably discharged soldier self-supporting. Such privilege shall be granted under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the President."

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, all I have to say as to that is that if we are to take the boys under 21 out of the schools and put them into the trenches we ought to provide for their education when they come home.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GOOD: Page 6, line 14, after the word "available," insert "for expenses incurred in laundering the clothing of enlisted men in Government plants, and no part of the pay of such men shall be taken for such laundry work."

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, under the present arrangement at our various cantonments, or at least in most of them, the Government has established laundries to do the laundry work of the boys who are in training there. One dollar per month is being deducted from the pay of the enlisted men for doing this work. This is contrary to the advertisements of the War Department. One of the arguments that has always been made for securing enlistments in the Army is that the Government furnishes clothing, provisions, and everything, and that the enlisted man was not permitted to pay for any portion of his subsistence. Now, in all these places where these Government laundries have been established they are deducting $1 per month from the pay of enlisted men. I do not believe that the House or the country would for one minute countenance such small practices, and it seems to me that we ought to correct it. We should prevent it. That is the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOOD) there were 85 ayes and 34 noes.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12731) amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. SIMS. I demand a separate vote on the Gregg amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment; if not, the Chair will put the balance in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote on any other amendment.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the Gregg amendment.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment be reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by adding after the word "emergency," line 12, page 3, the following: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed to exempt from draft into the Army under this act or under any act heretofore passed the officers, legislative and executive, of the United States or of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and section 4 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917, be so amended as to eliminate after the words 'That the Vice President of the United States' the words 'the officers, legislative and executive, of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia.'"

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. Thirty-five Members have arisen; not a sufficient number.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The other side was taken.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and ninety-one Members have arisen. Thirty-five is not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused. The question is on agreeing to the Gregg amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GREGG) there were 89 ayes and 143 noes.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

The question of ordering tellers was taken.

The SPEAKER. Nineteen Members have arisen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit.

Mr. GILLETT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GILLETT. Is the gentleman from Alabama opposed to the bill?

Mr. DENT. I am not opposed to the bill. I do not know of anybody that is opposed to the bill who desires to offer a motion to recommit, and under the rule I am entitled to offer it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I suggest that the gentleman from Alabama is qualified to offer it unless somebody who is opposed to the bill wishes to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The Chair laid down the rule four or five years ago about motions to recommit; that in the first place it should go to somebody opposed to the bill; and second, that a member of the committee should have preference. Now, if there is any gentleman in the House who wishes to offer a motion to recommit who is opposed to the bill and will stand up and say so, the Chair will recognize him in preference to the gentleman from Alabama, otherwise the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DENT moves to recommit the bill H. R. 12731 to the Committee on Military Affairs with instruction to report back the same immediately with the following amendment: Insert after the word "prescribe," in line 7, on page 2, of the printed bill, the following: "Provided however, That registrants who on the date fixed by the President for registration are of the age of 18 years and not over 19 years shall be designated as the 18 class and shall be drafted for service subsequent to registrants in class 1 of the age of 19 years and over 19 years."

Mr. DENT. On that I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 147, nays 194, answered "present" 1, not voting 88, as follows:

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY] vote?

The SPEAKER. He is not recorded.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I desire to withdraw my vote of yea and answer "present," as I am paired with the gentleman.

The name of Mr. SLAYDEN was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 336, nays 2, not voting 92, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. BLACK with Mr. COPLEY.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma with Mr. STEENERSON.

Mr. CHURCH with Mr. BAER.

Mr. SUMNERS with Mr. PRATT.

Mr. KEATING with Mr. BROWNE.

Mr. VINSON with Mr. HAYES.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, Mr. SNELL and Mr. MOTT, of New York, and Mr. BRITTEN, of Illinois, have telegraphed that it is impossible for them to be here, but if here they would vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an announcement. I am paired with Mr. MCKINLEY, of Illinois, who did not vote, but I have been reliably informed that if present he would vote for the bill, and therefore I let my vote stand. I voted in favor of the passage of the bill.

On motion of Mr. DENT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid upon the table.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the subject matter of the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks that all gentlemen be permitted within five legislative days to extend their remarks on this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS ON MONDAY.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that next Monday is District day, and therefore the water-power bill will not be taken up.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on next Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table, I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that next Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of the business on the Speaker's table, he be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask at the same time that I be permitted, at the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, to address the House for 20 minutes on the relation of Government commissions to the business public of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks that on next Tuesday, after the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] concludes, and if he gets permission to make a speech, that he be permitted to proceed for 20 minutes on the subject of the relation of Government commissions to the business public of the United States. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN]?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the subject on which the gentleman intends to speak.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to address the House on the subject of the character and patriotism of the membership of this House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech made by Representative KAHN, of California, at Cleveland, Ohio, on July 27, 1918.

Mr. LANGLEY. On what subject?

Mr. EMERSON. On patriotism and matters of that kind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CORRECTION OF PAIRS.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I wish to have the RECORD corrected. Both the gentleman from New York, Mr. CALDWELL, and I have discovered that we were paired, seemingly against each other, though we favored the increase in the postal employees' salary. I ask unanimous consent to have the RECORD corrected to show that Mr. CALDWELL and I both favored the increase in salary.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that is one of these pairs that go into the RECORD without the consent of the Members, and I desire to again call the Speaker's attention to the fact that he promised some time ago that he would write a letter or give directions that this should not occur again. Here is one of these universal pairs put up by the gentleman from New York, Mr. CALDWELL, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. CHANDLER, on the opposite side. Now, I insist that this matter ought to be corrected, because it is putting gentlemen in a wrong attitude. It is poor business and ought to be stopped, and I do hope the Speaker will give directions accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts very much whether he has the right to do it or not. I have announced here three or four times, and will announce again, that neither the House nor the Speaker has anything to do with this pair business. It is an excrescence that has grown up on the body politic. If gentlemen want to find out the philosophy of the thing, they ought to read Benton's Thirty Years in Congress.

Mr. GARNER. I ask unanimous consent that in the future no pairs be put up unless signed by the Members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that in the future no pairs be put up unless actually signed by the Members.

Mr. LANGLEY. Reserving the right to object, suppose some gentleman would wire here in order to get a pair?

The SPEAKER. I do not know.

Mr. LANGLEY. I object.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, in the case of Mr. CHANDLER of New York and Mr. CALDWELL, I happen to know from conversation that they were both in favor of the legislation on which they were paired.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] will be granted.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4527. An act to authorize the payment of indemnities to the Government of Greece for injuries inflicted on its nationals during riots occurring in South Omaha, Nebr., February 21, 1909.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, August 26, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a proposed draft of a bill to give warrant officers on shore duty beyond the continental limits of the United States the same pay as they now receive while on sea duty (H. Doc. No. 1263), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CLARK of Florida: A bill (H. R. 12812) to provide further for the national security and defense by authorizing the President to control rental charges in certain areas, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. WALDOW: A bill (H. R. 12813) prohibiting the advertisement by mail and the interstate shipment of firearms except for authorized and lawful use; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. BLAND of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 12814) increasing rates of certain pensions under the general law; to the Committee on Pensions.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BRODBECK: A bill (H. R. 12815) to correct the military record of Daniel M. Witmyer; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WHITE of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 12816) for the relief of William Fouts; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ALEXANDER: Petition of the Methodist Episcopal Churches of Mount Moriah, Akron, and Glaxe, in Harrison County, Mo., for legislation prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for the period of the war and demobilization; to the Committee on the Judiciary.
